L.e.a. raises doubts about schools for maladjusted

by Mark Vaughan

A critical report on an independent school for maladjusted children in Hampshire has been prepared by Walsall education authority and sent to the Department of Education and Science and two other L.e.a.s who send children to the school.

Mr Bill Withnall, the chairman of Walsall education committee, said the report had implications for all education authorities who take up places at these types of schools.

The report was prepared by Mr R. W. Hart, Walsall's senior inspector for special education, after a beating incident at the school in February involving an 11-year-old Walsall boy. A child care officer at the school—Bylands in Stratfield Turgis near Basingstoke—was said to have made two boys bend over and to have allowed other boys in the school to slap them on the bottom.

The child care officer, Mr Bernd "Frank" Matthes, 43, who has since left the school, was reported in the press at the time as saying that the punishment was the only way he knew to cure stealing at Bylands. He said he was criticized by the head of the school, and that he was not dismissed but resigned after the incident.

Walsall education authority subsequently withdrew the boy and placed him in one of their own newly opened schools for maladjusted children, Daw End School.

The authority have sent copies of their report to Hampshire, who have 10 boys at the school, and to the Inner London Education Authority, who have four. Mr Bruce George, Labour MP for Walsall South, has also been given a copy of the report. He is to put a question in the House of Commons about maladjusted schools in general, and to ask Mr Fred Mulley, the Education Secretary, to comment on Walsall's report about Bylands.

The eight-page report, which contains both critical and favourable comments by Mr Hart, deals with the staff of the school, their qualifications, the timetable, teaching accommodation, furniture, apparatus and equipment, and the specific organization for maladjusted children.

It goes on to talk about the residential part of the school and deals with the daily routine, the different activities the boys take up during the day and evening, the bedrooms, the surgery and sick bay, the bathrooms and toilets, the corridors, the state of decoration, and the school's uniform.

Immediately after the incident, inspectors and advisers from Walsall, Hampshire and the ILEA went to the school and prepared reports. The DES also sent one of their inspectors after the incident, and they are sending another to the school this term to compile a second report. Bylands, which has 50 boys aged eight to 15, is recognized by the DES.

The DES have told Walsall that, while they do not think all of Mr Hart's comments are justified, they do consider it necessary to make a longer visit to the school this term. The HMI they are sending will be accompanied by the Department's medical adviser.

A spokesman for Hampshire said their senior education adviser did not find anything at the school to warrant the withdrawal of their 10 boys at Bylands. But, he added: "We have made recommendations on action the principal can take to improve the quality of new staff he may appoint."

Mr S. A. Freeman, principal of the school, said he had not seen the report and could not comment on any part of it. He did not want to make any further comment.

Mr Bill Withnall, chairman of Walsall education committee, said fees at the school were £2,700 a year. This was the figure given to a meeting of the education committee last month.

He said: "A local authority that charged £2,700 a year would be providing better facilities in the way of class sizes and facilities generally, for that amount of money."

He said the report on the school —which has not yet been published —would come before the next meeting of the schools subcommittee. "I think the report has national implications for L.e.a.s who take up places at these schools. It will make authorities less ready to accept DES classification of such schools, and lead them to be much more wary of taking up places at independent schools for the maladjusted."

The incident at the school and the inspection by Mr Hart had prompted the seven L.e.a.s in the West Midlands metropolitan county council to set up their own monitoring system of the independent schools they use. "They are now going to be regularly visited by an officer from one of seven authorities", Mr Withnall said.

He thought the incident and the report also pointed out the need for continued expansion of special education by local authorities through DES allocations, "so that the need to use independent establishments is diminished, and the cost to the ratepayer is diminished".

He criticized the DES response to the report as "a very leisurely reply". "We regard the DES reply as unsatisfactory, which is why we have asked Mr George to exert some pressure."

Mr George said: "If there is some concern about some of the recognized schools for maladjusted children, then it follows that one would have to look closely at those which are not recognized.

"As well as asking a question in the House, I shall be writing to Mr Mulley to see if he is satisfied with the way in which special schools are operating, and if he is satisfied with the checks that his inspectors are able to make. I will also ask him if he can comment on the report produced by Walsall. I have been told that the beating incident was untypical in the school."

Mr George went on: "The report on the school is critical and I would certainly want the DES's comments on it. I really want Mr Mulley to tell me whether this is an unusual position in the 134 recognized and non-recognized independent schools for maladjusted, and children with other handicaps."

The whole purpose of remedial education "seemed to be destroyed" if DES-recommended ratios of 1:7 for qualified staff to pupils were not adhered to in these independent schools.

Manpower forecasts or a better grapevine?

Mr Gerry Fowler, Lord Crowther-Hunt's successor as Minister of State at the Department of Education and Science, picked up the twin issues of graduate employment and manpower planning last week, when he addressed the Standing Conference of Employers of Graduates (page 15).

Not that his message bore any close relation to the earlier Crowther-Hunt line. What Mr Fowler emphasized was the importance of employers themselves taking a hand in the debate. "Employers", he said, "have a proper interest in seeking to guide the career, and hence the educational, choices of those still at school. . . . Employers perhaps more than anyone else can get across to those who are faced with such choices the advantages of particular courses, and the importance of keeping up certain disciplines, such as mathematics and at least one science, in order to facilitate entry into, and development within, those careers. And in all of this — is of course just as vital, if not more so, to communicate the message to the teachers as well as to the pupils."

In other words, Mr Fowler is saying: the science of manpower planning is in its infancy and cannot help much, so we had better rely on laisser faire: let the market in ideas flourish; let employers with their competing advice create a climate within which informed individual decisions can be made which, let us hope, will be responsive both to employment opportunities and national needs.

It is a persuasive argument—perhaps the only one which can accommodate both the belief that education has responsibilities towards "wealth-generating" industry and a proper agnosticism about future employment trends. (The Manpower Services Commission are charged with manpower planning functions but have hardly begun to carry them out.) But some of Mr Fowler's political colleagues will have difficulty in reconciling it with their own emotional hostility towards employers' profit motives. Moreover, the long-standing desire to insulate the schools from the more obvious external pressures is academic no less than political.

And if it is right for employers to press for "keeping up certain disciplines, such as mathematics and at least one science" because these are necessary to keep open a wide range of career and educational choices, why is this not also being pursued by the DES? Are these Dainton-type arguments not relevant to the secondary curriculum now being discussed in an almost exclusively educational forum in connexion with exam reform? Is it enough for the DES to sit back in a box seat and urge employers to play the ball among themselves, as if the Secretary of State were no more than an interested spectator?

Meanwhile, in another part of the forest (today's issue of The Times Higher Education Supplement) Lord Crowther-Hunt himself takes up the pen in the first of three articles on the DES. The temporary politician reverts to the politics don, and offers a highly critical dissection of the DES approach to long-term educational planning. He notes how completely the Department have rejected the Fulton recommendations for a strong, relatively independent, planning unit staffed by professionals, in favour of the distribution of planning responsibilities throughout the operational sections of the Department, where they compete for time and effort with more pressing day-to-day demands.

With the authority of an ex-DES Minister, albeit one who was never quite at home at Elizabeth House, Lord Crowther-Hunt has added his own criticisms to those of last summer from the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development examiners. He now looks like being a star witness for the Commons Select Committee when he appears before them on Monday.

EEC challenge on fees worries DES

The Department of Education and Science was perturbed this week by reports that the European Economic Community could challenge the 30 per cent fee increase for overseas students at British universities and colleges which is due to be levied in September.

Although the department takes the view that the level of fees is purely a domestic matter and of no concern to the EEC, a spokesman said the legal implications were being looked at "to see if we are in breach of the Treaty of Rome".

Dr Guido Brunner, EEC Commissioner for Education, Science and Research, is concerned that discriminatory fees may violate the treaty by restricting students freedom of movement. In reply to a question from Lord Gladwyn in the European Parliament last month, Dr Brunner said any form of restriction was not in the spirit of the treaty.

Lord Gladwyn is chairman of the United Kingdom Council on Overseas' Students Affairs which has opposed the increase from £320 to £416. British students will also pay more—£182 instead of £140 a year.

Mr W. H. Beale, general secretary of UKCOSA, said he was concerned at the divergence of approach between the Department of Education and the EEC Commission. He would not be satisfied if the department made no distinction between European and British students but discriminated against other foreigners.

There are nearly 70,000 overseas students at British colleges and universities. A third of postgraduate students are from abroad but only a small percentage are from Europe, a department spokesman said. "Very few students are from EEC countries."

The National Union of Students said they were prepared to support a move to take the British Government to the European Court at Luxembourg.

Retarded: targets too low

Teachers and others in charge of mentally handicapped people expect too little of them, said Mr James Elliott, associate director of the King's Fund Centre, London, this week.

He told a conference on the employment of mentally handicapped people that targets were too low in schools and training centres, regular assessment was often inappropriate and detailed training programmes were rare.

There should be more interchange of staff and trainees between local authority training centres and hospital day centres, he said. Work was hard to find for those capable of it. Employers were apprehensive about employing the mentally handicapped. "We must blame ourselves for their hesitancy."

Employers needed counselling so that they could understand the problems of the mentally handicapped. Voluntary agencies and government departments should champion the rights of the mentally handicapped and persuade employers that they could make good workers.

Parents of the mentally handicapped accepted the disability too readily, said a regional organizer for the National Society for Mentally Handicapped Children. Parents were too pessimistic.

Youth on race relations

What the youth service thinks and does about race relations is to be the subject of the first in a series of Sunday afternoon conferences for young people to be held by the Waltham Forest Youth Council this summer. It will take place at Wellington Avenue Youth Centre on May 23.

Under the title "Culture within the Youth Service", the meeting will consider the extent of racial discrimination in youth organizations, the amount of attention paid to cultural background and the attitudes of different racial groups.

Essex ban foreign teachers

Foreign teachers will not be employed in Essex schools because the county says there are too many unemployed British ones.

A county information officer said this week: "We do not employ teachers from outside Europe for no other reason than that they cannot get a work permit".

However, a lecturer at North East London Polytechnic said that the county had rejected an application from a French student who was finishing her training course at the polytechnic, on the grounds that she was foreign.

When employing foreigners, the local authority have to apply for work permits. One of the questions on the form asks if there is no suitably qualified British resident who could do the same job. Because there are so many unemployed British teachers, the county would have to answer "yes" and the permit would be refused.

Essex's attitude contrasts sharply with that of the Inner London Education Authority who mounted a recruitment drive in Cyprus two years ago to find mathematics and science teachers. Seven of the 11 Cypriot teachers who came over are still working in the authority's schools.

PERSONAL COLUMN

Dear Mr Mulley,—I do not think it will have escaped your notice that the role of the independent schools in the national education provision is now more important than at any time since the war. Of course, many of those who claim to be your supporters, particularly the self-styled campaigners for the advancement of state education, would not only reject this assertion, they would also deny that independent schools are part of the national education provision at all.

Let us forget them for a moment. The point about the role of the independent schools is this. When your Education Bill comes into effect, the independent secondary schools will be the only practitioners of academic selection in the country.

It may seem ironic to those who remember the philistinism of many pre-war public schools that the survival of learning and scholarship in British schools should increasingly depend on establishments once dominated by muddled oafs and flannelled fools.

"I declare that it makes me very sad sometimes", A. C. Benson wrote in 1904, "to see these well-groomed, well-mannered, rational, manly boys all taking the same view of things, all doing the same things, smiling politely at the eccentricity of anyone who finds matter for serious interest in books, art or music."

But The Times of 1924 did not find it at all sad; the value of a public school education was that it induced boys "to discuss their individual wealness and doubts an selfish joh". Even the Gestapo, joining a long line of political thugs who planned to abolish the public schools, grasped this essential characteristic. This country and its public school ideal, their handbook for the invasion of Britain in 1940 explained, produced "men of inflexible will and without any scruples, who do not concern themselves with intellectual matters".

It would be nonsense to claim that in 1976 every independent school encouraged the rigorous pursuits of intellectual excellence, but the demands of the universities on the one hand and of the parents on the other have freed all independent schools to place sound learning at the centre of their education.

This change has coincided with the increasing eccentricity of sound learning in the maintained schools and with the State's selection of any form of selection as academic heresy.

John Rae

What even the Gestapo knew

It is an attractive doctrine. It appeals to the heart as it seems to promote the brotherhood of man. It gives promise of the longed-for womb in which there will be neither success nor failure, competition or disappointment.

I am not saying that these are the secluded longings are unnatural. I am saying that there is at least room to doubt whether they form a proper basis for the organization of secondary education.

You do not need me to remind you of the growing disquiet about the level of basic skills and knowledge displayed by boys and girls leaving secondary schools. The Black Papers you may dismiss as part of the knockabout comedy that passes for educational debate in this country, but you cannot dismiss the publicly voiced concern of the University Grants Committee. There is serious doubt about the doctrine of non-selection in practice. I would be insulting you if I thought that you did not share that doubt. Any intelligent and open-minded person must share it.

This is why the role of the independent schools is now so important. These schools will continue to practise academic selection and to demonstrate its advantages for the individual and the nation. This role cannot be played by anyone else.

In this situation it makes no sense for politicians and administrators to treat the independent schools as embarrassing, lunatic relations who ought to be put to sleep and the sooner the better. The move undermined attempts to plant political extremism in this country and it has saved us from the silliest manifestations of religious enthusiasm. For us, men and women who cannot conceive the possibility that they are wrong are at best ridiculous and at worst pernicious.

Which brings me back to some of those who regard themselves as the champions of state education. To seek to improve the nation's schools is admirable, to press the advantages of a particular doctrine shows a degree of genuine concern, but to assert that that doctrine alone is the repository of all wisdom and that those who refuse to practise it should be excommunicated is an attitude at once arrogant and utterly alien to the country's tradition of tolerant scepticism.

The doctrine is, of course, that selection in secondary education is nothing for those in the third tier, "fringe" areas.

On Monday, however, the teachers, panel of the Burnham Committee decided to ask for a percentage increase for all teachers now receiving London weighting. If this is accepted by the management panel, it will probably mean a rise of about 9 per cent.

The top tier allowance is now £351, the second tier, £267, and the third tier, £141. The full Burnham Committee will discuss the share out of the £2.62m next Monday.

Dear Sir,
I would be grateful if you would allow me to make a few comments on John Rae's article.

Mr Rae's assertion that the role of the independent schools is now more important than at any time since the war is based on the assumption that the maintained schools have abandoned academic selection. This is not the case. Many local authorities have chosen to retain selection by ability and aptitude, and in those areas the grammar schools are flourishing. Mr Rae's assertion is therefore not true for the whole country.

Middle school system in chaos, say assistant masters

By Sue Cameron

A new report on Britain's middle schools shows that the system is in chaos. It blames the teachers, who operate in splendid isolation with no thought of how their pupils are going to cope when they reach senior school.

The survey of 40 middle schools published this week they include the findings of a one-day conference held last year which was attended by middle and senior school teachers.

In many areas, they found, there was little or no cooperation between senior schools and the middle schools from which they drew their pupils. Curriculum and teaching methods often differed wildly as did standards of assessment. Many middle schools did not even bother to pass on detailed records of children's difficulties and achievements.

"In maths, modern languages and science there can be very considerable variations in the ground covered by pupils from different middle schools—and in the teaching methods.

"In maths the traditional and special maths project approaches are quite distinctive and the topics normally dealt with between the ages of 11 and 13 are quite different. Pupils inevitably mark time at some stage during the first year of senior school.

"Some middle schools regard the study of a modern language as being of prime importance while others do not. Some pupils arrive at senior school with a great deal of knowledge and expertise and others with little or none. Some middle schools are unable to recruit qualified staff while others are more fortunate and may even introduce the pupils to two modern languages.

"In many of the senior schools a disguised new start has to be made. One school claimed it had to do the usual first year work in the first term, the second year work in the second term and then, with any luck, it could start on the third year work in the summer term."

Their report on the survey says that the work covered by different middle schools makes "life very difficult" for teachers in the receiving senior schools. And work in the senior schools becomes equally difficult for the pupils.

There is now a demand for all feeder middle schools to follow a common core curriculum in science, but even in the areas where this has been agreed by the teachers they do not always follow the course or complete it. Yet AMA members working in middle schools insist that no part of their curriculum should be dictated by the senior schools.

It was claimed that any discussion on curriculum matters and on teaching methods from the staffs of senior schools would be unacceptable and, indeed, intolerable. This view was accepted by AMA members from senior schools. But it was argued very forcibly that the successful working of the system depended on the willingness of teachers to ensure there was continuity in the education of the children and this required close cooperation on curriculum and syllabus matters.

"It makes little sense if some of the middle schools feeding a senior school teach German when the senior school teaches only French, if science in some middle schools means only biology, or if some middle schools insist upon teaching maths in the traditional style when the senior school adopts the modern approach.

"Teachers in middle and senior schools must get together to ensure the work done in the middle schools leads naturally and easily into the work which the senior school does in its first year."

One special difficulty which middle schools for nine to 13-year-olds was that senior schools were left with only three years in which to prepare pupils for exams. Many senior school teachers felt this was far too short a time, especially if the feeder middle schools had failed in one way or another to prepare their children for senior school work.

Most senior schools took pupils from five or six middle schools, but one senior school that was studied took pupils from no fewer than 40 middle schools. This school set tests in English and mathematics for all its future pupils.

Other senior schools had much greater difficulty in assessing their new pupils. This was because there was considerable variation in the standards of different middle schools. And in one area where middle schools were asked to grade children on an A to E scale, one school never gave higher than a grade C while another "gave an abundance of As".

One suggested reason for the present mess and muddle in the middle school system is the way in which it was started. The report says that in many places middle schools had been brought in for "administrative convenience—the buildings fitted—and not on educational grounds."

Pupils sent home as NAS stage walk-out

School teachers in the north west walked out of their classrooms this week in protest against oversized classes and education cuts. As a result hundred of pupils in Cumbria and Lancashire were either sent home or left to work on their own under the head's supervision.

All the teachers belong to the National Association of Schoolmasters Union of Women Teachers. Approximately 1,000 are taking action in Cumbria and another 2,500 in Lancashire.

All refuse to teach primary classes of over 35 or secondary classes of over 30. They have also decided not to do the work of colleagues who are absent for more than three days or cover teaching posts that have been left unfilled.

Mr Alf Bellarby, NAS executive member for Cumbria, said this week there were plans to cut more than £1m from the county's education budget. This would mean the teaching force would be cut by about 100 and there would be a worsening of the pupil-teacher ratio.

"We started our action on Monday and we have been surprised at how many oversized classes there are in Cumbria. We reckon nearly all the county's 400 schools will be affected.

"We are not allowing heads to remove a couple of children from an oversized class so as to persuade our people to go in and teach. No primary classes of 35 plus or secondary groups of 30 plus are being taught at all unless they are examination classes. If a class of over 30 is preparing for a public examination then our members may ask for permission to teach in the interests of the children.

"We believe our action is beginning to have some effect and the authority is now starting to draft in supply teachers. Up to this week it has been very hard for any school to obtain supply teachers."

Mr Bellarby added that his association was prepared to discuss the whole question of teacher supply with the local authority but their request to meet elected council leaders had not yet been answered.

It is understood the other teachers' unions are supporting the NAS/UWT action and the National Union of Teachers may consider instituting their own no-cover policy in Cumbria.

More power to parents

Teachers have welcomed the Bennett report which shows that pupils do better in traditional classrooms than in progressive ones.

This week the National Association of Schoolmasters—Union of Women Teachers said the report clearly showed that informal teaching methods led to a lowering of standards. They want parents to play a greater part in preventing the "wilder excesses of free teaching methods".

"For the first time some fashionable but highly doubious teaching methods have been closely examined and found wanting," the schoolteachers say, in a specially prepared statement.

"Many young teachers are thoroughly confused by the plethora of untried theories. It is for this reason the NAS/UWT set great store by the need for induction and in-service training, one of the aims of which would be to allow time for teachers to assimilate, assess, reject or fit the new theories into their classrooms.

"Passive acceptance, without understanding, of theory and changing method can at best provide but a poor imitation of another's practice. At worst it can lead to misunderstanding resulting in the demoralization of teacher and child."

New move on London allowance

Local authorities will be told next week that there should be a percentage increase in the London allowance for all teachers who are now receiving it.

The teachers' original demands for a rise in London weighting were turned down flat by the management some months ago and the matter was referred to arbitration. At Easter the arbitrators announced a £2.62m increase, but recommended that the extra cash be shared between teachers in Inner and Outer London. There would be

Study urged of TV violence

A world-wide survey of the relationship between violence on television and the behaviour of young people should be undertaken by a research team, say the Home Office after talks with the British Board of Film Censors. The findings should be known by the autumn.

The survey is called for, said a spokesman for the board this week, because the evidence is conflicting and many people feel strongly about the effects of violence.

Aircraft noise 'appalling'

Conditions at a primary school 800 yards from one of the main runways at Heathrow airport are "appalling", said Mr Max Morris, National Union of Teachers' executive member for Outer London, this week. In the summer, up to 20 per cent of teaching time can be lost. The staff are at the end of their tether.

His complaint, on behalf of the children and staff at Beavers Junior School, Hounslow, is part of a joint attempt by the NUT, Hounslow Education Authority and Mr Russell Kerr, MP for Feltham, to get money to soundproof the school or to build a new one.

The Department of Trade, which controls the British Airports Authority, has powers to extend the grants made to householders who live in aircraft flight paths to buildings other than houses, but so far the powers have not been used. It would cost more than £300,000 to soundproof the school.

The joint plea comes in the same week as the publication of the interim findings of a survey commissioned by the Local Authorities Aircraft Noise Council. These say that Concorde noise levels could be a "significant hazard" to the hearing of people living close to Heathrow, particularly children playing out of doors.

Ways to drum up German

The department of German studies at University College, London, are so worried about the future supply of students in their subject that they are planning to admit some candidates without A level.

The new scheme will operate from autumn, 1977, when they will be able to cooperate with the Goethe Institute in London to offer crash courses to suitable candidates, who will probably have O level German.

Last week the department held a dinner at University College for sixth-form teachers and local authority language advisers to discuss the future of German studies in schools and universities, at which the plan was announced.

Professor J. P. Stern, the department's director, said there was no question of changing the academic content of their course to include what was supposed to be relevant to the needs of industry and trade. Their course fitted candidates for many of the same careers as any other degree, as well as the Civil Service and teaching.

Several teachers present said they had promising pupils who gave up the subject in the sixth form, because they had been persuaded that it would be better for their careers to specialize in science. Although it would be useful for future international careers to have a language as well as science, this was usually not possible.

Mrs C. Kisch, language inspector for the Inner London Education Authority, pointed out that a wider sixth-form curriculum would for this reason help the cause of language studies. The universities must share the blame, since they opposed Schools Council proposals, such as the N and F exams, which proposed broadening the curriculum in this way.

WHAT IF... your A levels are disappointing?

OR WHAT IF... you do better than expected?

A level pupils should look out for this pamphlet. It tells them where to go for advice during the summer holidays if their examination results are better—or worse—than expected. Four hundred local advisory officers in 280 Further Education Information Service centres in the country can help with information on training and educational opportunities.

Intensive Study Visits to France & Germany

If you are involved with school administration or with modern language teaching, you are likely to gain considerable benefit and interest from the Central Bureau's scheme for Intensive Study Visits to France and Germany. This scheme offers heads of schools and colleges, heads of departments and modern language advisers a subsidised visit of one, two or four weeks. Return rail/sea fares are paid and a grant of £27 p.w. (France) and £36 p.w. (Germany) is made towards subsistence. (LEAs or sponsoring establishments have been recommended to 'top up' this grant where appropriate.)

The scheme has the following aims and advantages:

i) it provides an opportunity for a detailed look at an equivalent establishment or district and for an objective assessment of how the teaching of modern languages is organised and administered in a different environment.

ii) it strengthens the links which have already been established between France and/or Germany and the UK at departmental, institutional and LEA level.

iii) it helps to explore and evaluate the advantages of teacher exchanges and gauge the long-term effects which these may have on individual teaching attitudes and methods.

iv) it encourages reciprocal visits and provides information and comment, possibly through meetings of returned bursars, about the further development of exchange schemes with other European countries.

Application forms can be obtained from the Central Bureau for Educational Visits and Exchanges, 43 Dorset Street, London W1H 3FN or 3 Bruntsfield Crescent, Edinburgh EH10 4HD. Closing dates: 31 May 1976 for autumn term 1976 visits; 31 October 1976 for spring term 1977 visits.

Last resort' action by counc puts Duncan in comprehensi

by Bob Doe

Bedfordshire Education Authority's decision to take 11-year-old Duncan Sibley of Stephens Close, Luton, into care after his parents refused for eight months to send him to a comprehensive school was "a last resort", a spokesman said this week.

In 1972 Duncan's father, Mr Kenneth Sibley, spent a week in prison for not paying a £10 fine for defying a school attendance order to send his two daughters to a comprehensive. He wanted them sent to grammar schools and the long drawn-out dispute only ended when a businessman offered to pay their fees at the Independent Park School, Yeovil.

This time the local authority have not prosecuted Mr Sibley for failing to comply with the school attendance order which they issued in February. Instead, they invoked the Children and Young Person's Act 1969. This amended the Education Act 1944. Education authorities are now required to consider applying to juvenile courts to take children into care instead of, or as well as, prosecuting the parents for their children's non-attendance.

The 1969 Act says that an education authority, and only an education authority, can bring a child before a juvenile court if they have reason to believe "he is of compulsory school age within the meaning of the Education Act 1944 and is not receiving an efficient full-time education suitable to his age, ability and aptitude."

If the child is "the subject of a school attendance order which is in force under Section 37 of the Education Act 1944 and has not been complied with", the court can order the parents to "enter into a recognisance to take proper care of him", issue a supervision order or direct that the child be taken into the care of the local authority, unless the parents prove he is receiving suitable education.

On Monday a juvenile court in Luton ordered that Duncan Sibley should be taken into care. He was removed to Runfold House, Luton, a council children's home. On Tuesday social workers took him to Icknield High School, a mixed comprehensive for 1,400 11 to 16-year-olds.

The l.e.a. would not say if they intend to prosecute Mr Sibley as well. A statement said: "The boy has been taken into care as a last resort following protracted attempts to provide schooling for him.

"In spite of numerous attempts by the authority to convince the parents, they turned down offers of schooling for Duncan at three Luton high schools. The only solution they offered was for Duncan to be educated at a private school outside the county, Sherrardswood School, in Welwyn, Herts. There is no educational reason for this to be provided by the authority."

Duncan: reluctantly to school.

Duncan has not attended school since last September. As with his sisters, who were kept away from school for 18 months, his parents have made some attempts at giving lessons though they did not argue that these were "full-time education suitable to his age, ability and aptitude" as required by the Education Act.

"We have never taken this view," Mr Sibley said. "We are not able to provide suitable education. This is what we pay our rates for."

The council's action in taking the boy into care would only do his son harm. He would appeal to the highest court even if it meant bankrupting himself.

He was holding out for the principle of the right of parents embodied in the Education Act to choose an education for their children suitable to their abilities. "The non-selective schools say they can provide this. I disagree with them."

Asked if this meant he wanted a grammar school education for his son, he said this depended on boy's abilities which the edu authority had not yet tested.

Duncan's mother, Mrs Joa ley, said: "My son was worried about going into a home but he was upset when decided to send him to a co hensive school. He said if not like it he would walk o come home."

The Sibleys are allowed Duncan twice during the we he can spend weekends at ho

Mr Chris Black, chairman education committee, said: sad that the parents of Dunca felt it necessary to put the in this position. I cannot it is in the best interest of for him to be involved in controversy.

"I only hope that the pare recognize the damage that licity will undoubtedly do son's future and that the accept that in the child's in he should be allowed to stay of our high schools."

by cost of 16-plus

Fears were expressed this week that some exam boards could run into serious financial trouble if a common examining system is introduced at 16-plus.

The CSE boards say that unless all the existing exam boards are swept away and replaced by regional and provincial bodies there would be open competition for common exam candidates. This would cause "administrative and financial difficulties" for some boards, as well as having serious educational consequences.

The CSE boards' concern is voiced in their report on the Schools Council joint exams subcommittee proposals for a common exam system at 16-plus. They insist that keeping the present boards to administer a common system would have major disadvantages, even though the idea is superficially attractive.

"The CSE boards believe that their own proposals for reorganization, based on the sharing of services within provinces, would not only match the educational purposes of the examination but would enable the most efficient use to be made of existing scarce resources of buildings, manpower and equipment.

"The proposals are the only ones which would ensure that examining boards were required to accept financial responsibility to the local authorities which provide the major part of their income. The proposals are also likely to prove more economical than the alternative schemes which are under consideration."

The CSE boards say they will be issuing further papers on the need for a new administrative structure and on the cost of setting it up.

Cost has been one of the main arguments used by the opponents of a new structure, notably the GCE boards.

In their report the CSE boards give full support to the establishment of a common system by 1981. They claim there is formidable evidence of the demand for a common system and also of its feasibility.

"All CSE boards have been involved in feasibility studies in one or more subjects and all the studies confirm, with varying degrees of success, the feasibility of a common system.

"The trial examinations were subjected to a detailed and rigorous scrutiny of a kind not often applied to existing examinations.

"This scrutiny revealed certain deficiencies which are due in part to the limited objectives and experimental nature of the exams. In those consortia where joint examinations are continuing to be offered, development work is being undertaken to resolve the outstanding problems and it is essential that this work should continue."

The boards do not mention any specific criticisms of the feasibility studies, but say they are certain the necessary development studies can be completed in time for a common system to be fully operational by 1981. They say development work by teachers must not be thwarted.

The CSE boards approve the Schools Council subcommittee's proposals for a seven-point grading scheme for the new exams although some boards would like fewer grades. They also say that the new exam should be called the Certificate of Education and not the Certificate of Education: Foundation as has been proposed.

to close on Saturday

As part of their financial cuts Surrey County Council are closing the county's 57 libraries on Saturday afternoons.

They say they have been forced to close their libraries on what is accepted as the busiest afternoon of the week to save £22,000 in overtime pay to staff. This in turn has led to all Saturday staff, many of whom are young people, losing their jobs.

During the past weeks the number of newspapers and periodicals at public libraries has also been run down, and one branch library is to be closed completely.

Dr Brian Coffin, chairman of the library committee, said: "We regret these closures, but it was the only way we could save this money. Closing on any other afternoon in the week would not bring about this saving. We are most anxious, so far as possible, to avoid having to close any libraries throughout the week."

in 'modern methods' row

The controversy started by Dr Neville Bennett's research into modern primary teaching methods took a new turn this week when Mr Barry Taylor, chief education officer for Somerset, issued a statement to make it clear to parents in his county where he stands on the issue.

Mr Taylor called for a nationwide monitoring system to check whether children are learning the three Rs or not. This would dispel parents' doubts about what goes on at school. "They have a right to know how their children are progressing compared with others."

Teachers should be prepared to justify and explain their methods. School managers and parents should question classroom activities. "Some parts of the education service have for too long been obscured in the conspiracy of professionalism."

He did not want to undermine modern methods, "but there has sometimes been a tendency to select a programme of work in the sacred cause of child-centred learning strictly according to its appeal to the children.

"By all means let us make learning fun—but we are teaching a bad lesson if we lead young children to believe that it can always be fun."

Mr Max Morris, a former president of the National Union of Teachers and now an executive member, said at an NUT meeting in Norfolk this week that teachers must show more publicly and effectively their genuine concern for maintaining and improving educational standards.

He criticized the "sociological rubbish and pseudo-educational bilge that sometimes emanates from teacher-training institutions and university departments".

On the other hand, he warned "it will be a major tragedy for schools if the current controversy on teaching methods becomes a Tom Tiddler's ground for politicians pursuing their devious ends".

While everyone, including teachers, should be concerned with standards, only teachers could decide what methods they should use.

Home thoughts of abroad for VSO volunteers

The demand for teachers in developing countries remains high and two-thirds of all Voluntary Service Overseas volunteers are wanted for teaching or instruction, says the VSO's annual report published this week.

The number of volunteers who want to work in education has started to rise again, although the VSO are still short of English, mathematics and science teachers. They also note that more trained teachers are volunteering, which means they can put more people into teacher training overseas.

A spokesman for the VSO said this week that she thought this change in their recruitment was connected with teacher unemployment in Britain.

Last year the VSO concluded that the drop in the number of people volunteering to teach was due to their fear that a period overseas would make it hard to get a job on their return. Now it appears that unemployment was persuading more teachers to go abroad.

They are doing some research into how difficult volunteers find it to get jobs when they come home. The results will be published at the end of the year.

At the moment, the report says, education is an area "which many Third World countries regard as the matrix of their other development strategies".

The VSO were only able or willing to supply half the 1,500 volunteers asked for last year. They reject some requests and are limited to keeping a total of 1,100 volunteers overseas by financial and administrative constraints. The Ministry of Overseas Development have offered them a grant of up to £785,000, 13 per cent more than last year.

The number of volunteers wanting to work on the agricultural and technical side has increased. The VSO expect the appointment of field officers in these fields and in health will stimulate a much wider spread of demand outside education from developing countries.

Christian nurture goals

Schools can no more be expected to teach Christian than Muslim, Jewish or humanist beliefs. In a pluralistic society the churches must take responsibility, says the report published this week by the British Council of Churches.

The Child in the Church says that children should no longer be treated separately from adults in church life and worship. Nor should they be protected from experiences and influences necessary to allow them to make up their minds about religion.

Childhood cannot be regarded as "merely a provisional and preparatory episode". It follows, says the report, that the church cannot begin with a definition of a Christian in adult terms, then plan what must be done to turn the child into the man.

"Christian nurture" should take place in a group of caring, accepting and involved adults. These could include parents who, with experts in the church, should be trained to have a general understanding of the principles of a religious upbringing.

Parents should be helped by their local churches to appreciate the Christian understanding of the Bible as well as modern Christian thought and child psychology. They could discuss how they practice their faith at home.

The report emphasizes the importance of an ecumenical approach. Local churches should find ways to exploit the work done by state schools "in their provision of an open descriptive religious education into a variety of religions, realizing that there is no necessary tension between such religious education and the goals of Christian nurture".

Church schools should explore and express the distinctions between RE and Christian nurture. They should look particularly closely at what might be appropriate for Christian nurture.

The report was written by an interdenominational working party chaired by the Bishop of Bradwell, the Right Reverend John Gibbs. The working party was set up in the summer of 1973 by the consultative group on ministry among children of the British Council of Churches. The Child in the Church, British Council of Churches, 10 Eaton Gate, London SW1, 60p.

Rethink on final year

The purpose, content and use of the final year at school should be rethought to make young people better equipped for work, according to a report published this week by the Engineering Employers' Federation.

The report, by a study group looking into manpower in engineering, recognizes that the transition from school to work is not easy.

"The greater emphasis at school on self-expression contrasts with the need for discipline and conformity in industry", it says. More should be done, particularly in the final year, to prepare young people for work and help them to understand the contribution made by industry to their way of life.

Industry must play its part, too. "As a result of the uneven intake of apprentices in recent years, engineering has acquired a reputation for varying recruitment according to economic circumstances. The image of the industry as a satisfactory career for young people has consequently suffered badly. Teachers have become antagonistic towards the industry and are in many cases reluctant to recommend young people to enter it as a career."

The report recommends changes in the apprenticeship system to make it more attractive to young people.

Statistical techniques

The ways in which statistical techniques are used, as well as a basic introduction to statistical theory, are examined in a one year course being offered by the Open University next year. The course, "Statistics—An Interdisciplinary Approach", is one of eight being presented for the first time in the university's post-experience programme.

Uncertainty over jobless figures

Reports by Alan

Mr Fred Mulley, the Education Secretary, was asked in the Commons this week to estimate how many teachers qualifying this year and next would be without jobs. He told his questioner that uncertainty about trends in wastage and in re-entry to the profession made reliable estimates for 1976 and 1977 impossible.

Mr Tony Newton (Braintree, C) also wanted to know how many newly qualified teachers who left college in 1975 failed to get jobs.

Mr Mulley said 30,000 of the 41,000 teachers who qualified in 1975 (about three-quarters) had obtained full-time posts in maintained schools in England and Wales by January, 1976. This left 11,000 compared with 7,000-8,000 in recent years. These balances included those who obtained part-time posts in the maintained sector and posts as teachers in independent schools or outside England and Wales.

Mr Newton asked Mr Mulley for confirmation that something like a quarter of new teachers had not yet obtained employment. What did he propose to do to avoid the waste which would arise if they threw away this generation of young teachers and then found the birth rate increasing?

Mr Mulley replied that what he had made clear was that there were about 11,000 who had not obtained jobs in teaching. At the height of the teacher shortage, about 8,000 teachers did not take up jobs in teaching. They might well have taken up other jobs.

Mr Martin Flannery (Sheffield, Hillsborough, Lab) said there was a terrible drop in morale in colleges of education because of unemployment among teachers. After teachers had been trained—and his own son was one of the unemployed teachers from last year—they had a right after that expense to a job.

Mr Mulley said he accepted the right of everyone to a job and regarded it as equally unfortunate if architects, chemists, engineers or anyone else, after expensive training, was unable immediately to obtain the job they wanted. But at present the number of unemployed teachers was less than 1 per cent and, while it might go up next September, he did not see how a special exemption could be made for teachers from the general pressure on public expenditure.

The Government's public expenditure plans for 1976-77 were intended to preserve staffing ratios at 1975-76 levels. Within that constraint, he had urged local authorities to give priority in their recruitment plans to newly qualified teachers.

Mr Andrew Bennett (Stockport, North, Lab) said that although there were unemployed teachers there were also vacancies for certain specialist staff. Would Mr Mulley consider taking some of these unemployed teachers on to the government payroll and retraining them for other specialist subjects?

Mr Mulley said they were anxious to have schemes whereby particular shortages were catered for. One problem was that many former teachers were trying to get back into education because the circumstances were better and many authorities and schools preferred to employ them for vacancies.

Independence upheld

Universities should remain independent, said Mr Mulley. It would be rather difficult, whatever complexion of local authority or government were in power, if universities could be subjected to political pressures.

The exchanges arose when Mr Robert Kilroy-Silk (Ormskirk, Lab) complained of misguided education priorities. The universities were already getting a disproportionate share of scarce resources, they were already a privileged group in society.

"We need to shift resources away from universities to primary education to end the blight of outdated Victorian schools."

Mr Mulley, indicating he did not agree, said it was right to give priority to the statutory school age of five to 16 and then to the 16 to 19-year-olds. The universities were suffering a loss of expectations greater than others.

He did not think that university and further education was exclusively privileged education. He wanted to see more workers' children going to university.

Mr James Scott-Hopkins (West Derbyshire, C) said that in Derbyshire there were Victorian primary schools needing urgent renovation and funds had been cut.

Mr Mulley said it was a little hard in present economic circumstances that he should be asked to put right this year all the shortcomings of the past 75 years.

Mr Bruce Grocott (Lichfield and Tamworth, Lab) said finance and democratic control of universities should be brought into line with all other institutions of higher education, such as polytechnics. It was time they ended the distinction in higher education and introduced a proper universal comprehensive system of higher education as they were already rightly doing for the 11-plus.

Mr Mulley said that if they were to have a comprehensive system in the sense that everyone who wanted to go regardless of ability and aptitude could go, it would cost a great deal more and he would be in further trouble with Mr Kilroy-Silk on that account.

Truancy on talks agenda

Truancy will be one of the subjects on the agenda when Mr Mulley meets local authority, teacher and education welfare associations next month.

Mr Robert McCrindle (Brentwood and Ongar, C) said in the Commons this week that truancy showed no sign of abating. Would the Education Secretary consider asking l.e.a.s to publish truancy statistics and then to see whether the penalties on parents for truancy were sufficiently tough.

Miss Margaret Jackson, Under Secretary, did not accept all aspects of truancy were getting worse. Aspects which perhaps contributed to truancy, such as the raising of the school leaving age, had been assimilated, but there were still grave difficulties.

The collection and publication of more statistics was precisely the kind of thing the Education Secretary wanted to discuss next month. It was time-consuming and costly, and would mean much work for schools and l.e.a.s.

Mr Michael Ward (Peterborough, Lab) said publishing crude figures could be misleading. The Inner London Education Authority had found that what was called truancy could often be explained by the social circumstances of families.

Miss Jackson accepted that point. The issue was complex and needed to be considered carefully. It was important that MPs should consider whether what they said would contribute to an understanding and would help the problem, or make it worse.

Dr Rhodes Boyson (Brent, North, C) said spot checks by inspectors or officers would be more likely to produce right figures rather than statistics produced by schools. In January, 1974, when there was an absence survey, schools were warned more than two months before about it.

Miss Jackson said how statistics were collected would be discussed at the June meeting.

Questions

Capitation grants.—Sir George Sinclair (Dorking, C) asked the Secretary of State what steps he would take to ensure that local authorities were guided by his undertaking, given in the House of Commons on October 27, that capitation grants in respect of children presently in direct grant schools would continue until the children had completed their secondary education, and whether this included children studying in direct grant schools up to A level.

Mr Mulley said capitation grants would continue to be paid until the children left their present schools in the ordinary way.

Unemployed leavers.—Mr Robert Kilroy-Silk (Ormskirk, Lab) asked if the Secretary of State for Social Services would amend supplementary benefit regulations to the West Lancashire District Council to continue with its scheme to provide work experience for unemployed school leavers.

Mr Stanley Orme, Minister of State.—"No. Any work or training schemes to provide school leavers with work experience should be paid for at the appropriate rate for the job.

Postgraduate report 'soon'

Mr Gerry Fowler, Minister of State, hinted that a full reply might be published soon on the Expenditure Committee's report on postgraduate education. He was replying to Mr Neil Marten (Banbury, C) who complained bitterly about prolonged delay in replying to the committee's recommendations made two and a half years ago.

Mr Fowler agreed it was an excellent report which raised all the right questions even if it did not always provide the right answers. It had been necessary to consult many bodies including the vice-chancellors' committee and the Science Research Council. The DES would be ready to give a final reply shortly.

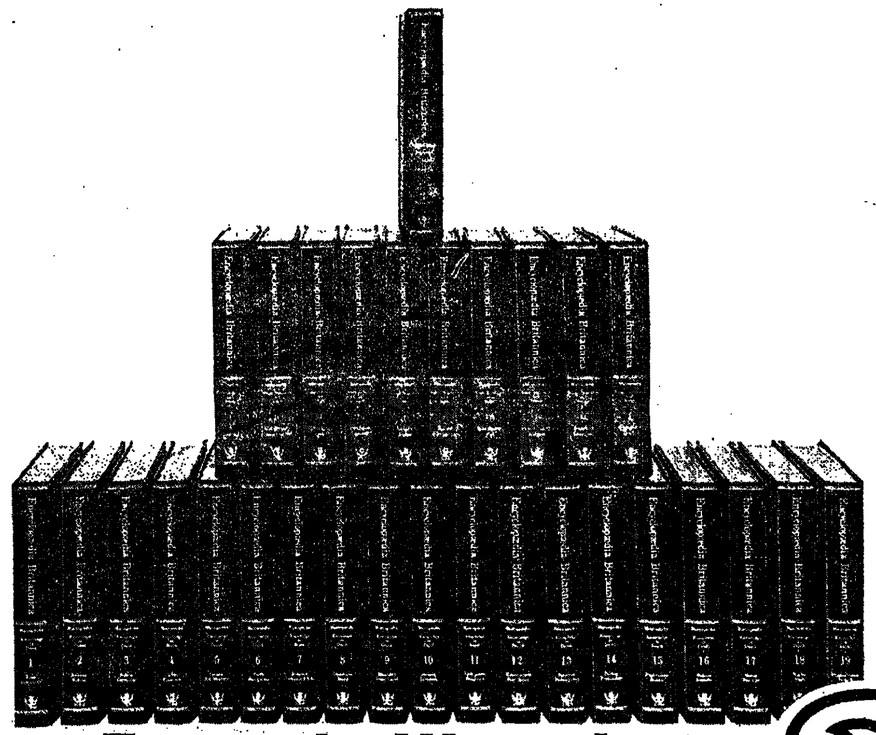
THE TIMES



Facts you should know about BRITANNICA 3

The biggest publishing surprise for 200 years, this completely re-thought and re-structured edition of Encyclopaedia Britannica – the 15th – takes a dramatic step forward in the organisation and presentation of knowledge.

The Three Levels of Study. Teachers and students need an encyclopaedia for different purposes at different times:
1. Ready reference – finding and checking basic facts quickly and accurately.
2. Studying a subject in much greater detail.
3. Studying in breadth as well as depth, with guidelines to relevant associated subjects.

To meet each of these very different needs in the clearest and most helpful way, Britannica 3 is arranged in three corresponding sections.

For the simple looking-up of facts . . .
the 10-volume Micropaedia contains short, accurate entries that give the basic information. Written in easily understandable language, and with over 17,500 illustrations that include many maps and charts, these volumes help even the younger pupils to enjoy the pleasure and rewards of looking things up. When further information is needed, each entry acts as an index to the section of the Macropaedia that covers the subject in greater depth.

For studying subjects in greater detail . . .
the 19-volume Macropaedia provides the breadth and depth of authoritative information for which Encyclopaedia Britannica has been famous for over 200 years.

Up-to-date in scholarship, substance and treatment, the very readable text, written by specialist world authorities, is copiously illustrated.

For surveying and exploring a field of study . . .
the Propaedia may be the most unusual single reference volume ever created, for it is no less than a systematic outline of human knowledge designed for flexible use in the pursuit of planned learning. The Propaedia is the kind of key which every encyclopaedia needs, but none has ever had before: a new means of unlocking, subject by subject, its storehouse of knowledge and making it easily available to teachers and students alike.

Leaflets warn of dangers behind the bright lights

The Government have printed 66,000 leaflets and posters warning young people of the difficulties and dangers they face if they come to London without a job or a home. They are to be distributed in stations and youth clubs.

This is the first official action in response to the problem of homeless young people in London which was featured in the Yorkshire Television documentary Johnny go home last summer.

News of the initiative was given last week by Mr David Ennals, Social Services Secretary. He was reporting on the progress of a Government - sponsored working group set up last September to look at what can be done to help.

The working group, which consists of civil servants from a number of government departments, local authorities and a few voluntary organizations, is almost ready to make its report.

It is expected to recommend setting up at least one information booth on a coach or railway station in London. Proposals for such a service have been drafted by a group of voluntary organizations and they have been invited by the Government to apply for a grant from the Voluntary Services Unit at the Home Office. Negotiations are still going on with British Rail about how to run such a service, but so far BR have shown some unwillingness to cooperate.

At the time of the television programme, a British Rail spokesman said they had no space on the concourse at Euston "and anyway we would not want to encourage people—non-travellers, down and outs—to come in and upset the passengers".

A spokesman for the British Rail Board added: "We are in the business to run a railway, we would not think of taking an initiative on a social work matter."

The working group is also expected to give its views about the relevance of housing legislation and policy and of cooperation between voluntary and statutory organizations to the difficulties faced by young people arriving in London.

The Campaign for the Homeless and Roofless, who were responsible for much of the pressure on government departments to take action on the issues raised in Johnny go home, said this week that they were "encouraged by the preparedness of various government departments to cooperate with each other in making resources available".

The campaign's spokesman, Ms June Lightfoot, said there should be immediate legislation putting a duty on local authorities to house single homeless people. They also wanted to see more social education in schools about what leaving home entails and more coordination nationally between housing and employment policies.

Heads ordered into line on staff appointments

London heads will no longer be allowed to appoint Scale 1 teachers directly in the five main "shortage" subjects. They will have to accept the teachers County Hall give them.

In a letter to heads recently, Dr Eric Briault, the education officer, said the authority had decided to start a pool of mathematics, physics, chemistry, handicraft and home economics teachers. The pool would be created at Easter each year, even though at that stage the authority did not know how many vacancies there would be in September.

"We clearly cannot afford to risk losing good candidates offering those subjects and it is proposed to continue to make firm offers centrally to suitable applicants at Easter in anticipation of September vacancies", he said.

The authority have therefore banned heads from sending out their own advertisements. Heads must first go through County Hall, and only if the authority do not have a suitable candidate from the pool of appointments they made at Easter, can the advertisement be forwarded to the usual agencies. If a head chose to ignore Dr Briault's instructions, the advertisements "may well be delayed", the letter said.

The authority's new policy has caused a minor row among some London heads, particularly those who have had large numbers of applicants for posts in the past. They are annoyed that they can no longer choose the candidate they think will best fit into the school.

A spokesman for the authority said it was highly unlikely that a school would be offered more than one candidate. But he said, "We would hope to make the appointment by agreement with the school."

One head said: "I feel that before a candidate is appointed he should be aware of what a school is trying to do in terms of the whole ethos of the place, in terms of the hidden curriculum; in terms of everything that makes one school different from another. I don't doubt that all the candidates offered to us by County Hall will have excellent qualifications. I am not worried about that. Teachers are not just subject people; they should be there to extend and develop school policy."

He thought teachers could be fitted into a school in a fairly coherent way, and it was the job of the head, staff and governors to see that this was done. "Many of us are experienced in building up staff according to the policy of the school."

Another head commented: "It is certainly annoying. I am not terribly sure what the authority think they are gaining." He was also concerned at the authority's new policy of no longer allowing probationary teachers to go to their new school in the last few weeks of the summer term before taking up their posts in September.

Minister appeals for specialists

Miss Margaret Jackson, Parliamentary Under-Secretary at the DES, this week appealed for people with practical experience in craft, design and technology to consider training as teachers. She drew attention to the shortened teacher training courses available for qualified mature students.

The DES already run an annual advertising recruiting campaign to combat the persistent shortage of technology, craft and design teachers. "For people with the right qualifications and a genuine desire to teach", said Miss Jackson, "there are many rewards in this career: to awaken the interest of potential engineers, designers, technologists and artist-craftsman; to encourage the development of craft skills that can be an outlet for creative expression; and to help young people develop practical skills that they can start using at once."

Lecturers put cuts campaign before pay

Teachers in further and higher education are expected to launch a national campaign against education cuts when the first conference of the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education meet in Derbyshire, at the end of the month.

A motion attacking the cuts and calling for a campaign of leaflets, pamphlets and posters has been moved top of the agenda. The redundancies should be resisted by all possible "means" and that ancillary services should be maintained, the motion says.

Second in priority is a claim for an increase in salaries, which demands that flat rate increase next year be used to reduce differentials. The association's executive have taken their own salary motion. This calls for the "maintenance of the existing relativities established by the Houghton report including full membership with university scales, while at the same time taking account any incomes policy negotiated between the TUC and the Government.

College government was the third most important and the resolution from the Outer London branch calls for NATFHE representation on college boards of governors, committees, and their accounts, and the local union branch.

Outer London also want union representatives to hold ex-officio seats on the boards and Trades Council membership of the governing bodies. Appointments committees should be set up to eliminate any discrimination on the grounds of "sex, race, ability, family status, religion, political belief or creed, political belief or religion".

The executive's second major motion on educational provision seeks an expansion of further education for 16 to 19-year-olds and the maintenance of at least 480,000 places in further training places in colleges.

The association, who have 70,000 members, were formed in June 1976 after the merger of the Association of Teachers in Technical Institutes and the Association of Teachers in Colleges and Departments of Education.

● Outer London also proposed that redundancies should be fought by all means necessary, including industrial sanctions as strike and occupation. And the branch fund their proposals for another resolution calling for a campaign in colleges and affiliates to the National Abortion Campaign.

DES ruling makes it tough for trainee art teachers

by David Hencke

Ten polytechnic and college art teacher centres face severe cuts or closure, because of a decision taken early this year to include art teacher training places in the 61,000 target for teacher education in 1981.

This was first disclosed in a sub-paragraph of Circular 1/76, published in January, a month after the Association of Centres of Art and Design Teacher Education had assumed that no decision had been made.

Art teacher training places will now have to be counted against the teacher training numbers given to colleges and polytechnics last August. In most cases, where the main course is the art teacher's diploma, a one-year postgraduate course, its numbers will have to be included in the college's allocation.

In many cases this is very small. At Leicester Polytechnic, only 30 out of the 500 teacher training places are for postgraduates and there are 65 students on the art diploma course.

Guidance from the DES suggests that the only way the 65 art places can be safeguarded is to reduce the number of students on three and four-year teacher training courses to just over 300.

The DES appear to offer only one safeguard, that art teacher training places will not be cut if the total of teacher training places is reduced from 61,000 to 57,000 later this year.

At Brighton Polytechnic which has 347 students on the art course, the largest in the country, the decision will cause great difficulty.

Mr G. R. Hall, the director, said that the whole planning of the polytechnic had been based on separate figures for art teachers and outside its 600 teacher training numbers. The polytechnic was considering a formal protest to the DES since the Department was aware of the situation for the last year.

Dr Brian Allison, chairman of the Association of Centres of Art and Design Teacher Education, said he was very concerned.

"It seems that all centres could face severe cuts and some could even be closed, in spite of the original idea to concentrate art and design teacher education in regional centres. What worries me is that there is no national policy or decision-making process for art and design education. It seems clear that the future of individual centres will depend absolutely on decisions taken at regional advisory council meetings or as a result of 'infighting' in individual institutions."

Dr Allison, who is also head of the school of educational studies at Leicester Polytechnic, said there was growing concern in art and design schools because 40 per cent of the recruits tended to apply for teacher training courses. They were now worried that opportunities would disappear.

The 10 centres are at Birmingham, Brighton, Bristol, Leeds, Leicester, Liverpool, Middlesex and Manchester polytechnics, Goldsmiths' College, London, and Cardiff School of Art.

Londoners take to the seaside

The seas and skies of Jersey were scanned last week by an expedition of three girls and seven boys from Winchmore School, Enfield. With two teachers, they were the guests of Victoria College, St Helier, at their observatory, a cliffton Martello tower built in 1837 and now equipped with a 10-inch reflector telescope.

A combination of all-night astronomy and marine biology which meant getting up early to catch tides proved pretty exhausting. But morale remained high in spite of this and the bitter cold. The tower's exposed position makes it rather draughty and the nine foot thick granite walls do not warm up until late summer.

Mr Brian Williams, head of physics at Winchmore School, said he had always envied biologists' field trips. He welcomed the chance to do some physics related field work and try out the telescope they had made at school away from the glare of London street lighting.

Before the trip he and his colleague, Mrs Joy Appleby, a biology teacher, were afraid they might not be able to keep their students occupied for a whole week. However, the opportunities offered by the island and the enthusiasm kindled had surpassed all expectations, in spite of the fact that several pupils face O levels in a few weeks time.

The teachers said they had seen previously unsuspected strengths and talents in their pupils, and mutual respect seemed to have been enhanced all round. Asked how she had found living with her teachers, one girl replied tactfully, "illuminating".

Mr Ed le Quesne, a teacher at Victoria College, is responsible for the observatory which pupils and former pupils helped to renovate and equip. They are now keen to share it with other schools on and off the island, both for astronomy and as a base for field studies for which Jersey is remarkably well suited.

The London Schools Concert Band joined in the Royal Festival Hall's silver jubilee celebrations with a performance on London's South Bank this week.

STOPP, the anti-caning pressure group, are out to improve their image among teachers. Mark Vaughan reports

More power to their elbows?

The Society of Teachers Opposed to Physical Punishment have changed their approach in their campaign to get corporal punishment outlawed in all schools. This week they moved nearer to the establishment with the announcement that Lady Plowden is to be their patron and that 40 prominent people have been invited to become sponsors.

Last year the society came close to disbanding through lack of support, and direction, but after a public meeting in London, they decided to continue for at least another year. They now have a new and larger committee.

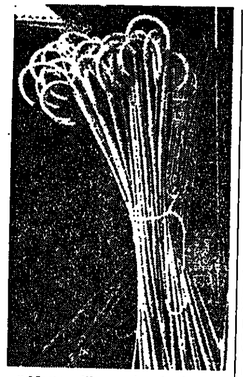
STOPP were formed in 1968 shortly after publication of the Plowden report, which was critical of corporal punishment in primary schools. So far, however, they have failed in their main goal of having it made illegal.

In a pilot survey of corporal punishment in public schools published this week the society say that only one head—Mr Christopher Wightwick, of King's College, Wimbledon—had stopped using the cane.

Seventeen out of 29 schools replied to a questionnaire. In three of these boys were still allowed to cane boys. Apart from King's College, none favoured abolition of corporal punishment. But a number of them said it was being used less.

Mr Alan Ambrose, a parent member of the STOPP committee who conducted the survey, intends to carry out a full survey of all public schools in the summer. Many masters, he says, are "on the verge" of agreeing to abolition, but they want to retain corporal punishment as a last resort.

Lady Plowden.



"Masters like to give the impression that the cane is not considered to be an issue of any significance today, that it is used less frequently, and that it tends to be reserved for very serious offences. They are possibly unaware of how faithfully they are echoing the findings of the Clarendon Commission of 1861 which looked into the running of nine leading public schools.

That commission said: "Corporal punishment has at the same time greatly diminished; flogging, which 20 or 30 years ago was resorted to as a matter of course for the most trifling offences, is now in general used sparingly and applied only to serious ones."

A housemaster told Mr Ambrose: "I believe corporal punishment to be most suitable for relatively trivial offences." Another wrote: "I'm afraid I am unable to support your cause, nor as far as I know are any of my colleagues. The cane is still used here by the warden and the housemasters, infrequently, but with conviction."

Mr Ambrose says: "The only encouragement I received was the cheery, if unhappily chosen reply: 'All power to your arm'."

STOPP have also recently obtained views on corporal punishment of 18 teacher unions in eight European countries. Mr Nick Peacey, chairman of STOPP, said Britain was alone in Europe in continuing to use it. "The major reaction by the European teacher unions was one of astonishment that it still goes on in this country. They were unanimous in saying that their members could manage without corporal punishment and that they have no wish to see it re-introduced."

STOPP also revealed that 12 l.e.a.s are reviewing their policies on corporal punishment. They are Avon, Cambridgeshire, Humberside, Kent, Oxfordshire, Newcastle, Newham, Rotherham, Sutton, Tameside, Wakefield and Waltham Forest. The Inner London Education Authority, according to a survey carried out by the society, remains the only l.e.a. to have abolished corporal punishment in primary schools.

Shropshire, said Mr Peacey, refused to reply, and Salford said they would not give information to STOPP, although their policy was available to any parent in the district.

● The Association of Metropolitan Authorities recently asked the Department of Education and Science to initiate discussions with the teachers' organizations so that "progress could be made towards the eventual abolition of corporal punishment in schools".

The DES wrote to all the local authority associations at the beginning of the year because of the "current interest" in the subject.

Literacy scheme under fire

by Frances Hill

The BBC's adult literacy scheme came under attack in London this week for concentrating on teaching adults to read, rather than educating them.

Speaking at a conference organized by the National Institute of Adult Education, Professor R. E. Jones, chairman of the institute's research steering committee, said the Department of Education and Science had given £1m to overcome "lack of specific skills", instead of launching an "open-ended educational venture" for teaching disadvantaged adults.

He claimed the decision to contribute £1m was in response to the Russell report, though the BBC deny this. The report emphasized the needs of disadvantaged people in adult education.

The DES felt that "surely anyone can teach people to read in a few hours", said Professor Jones. Internationally research had shown that illiteracy cannot be successfully tackled by simple lack of basic skills without reference to broader educational needs. The insularity of the BBC's literacy campaign has caused many difficulties which could have been avoided by drawing on the findings and experience of bodies such as Unesco.

Professor Jones deplored the fact that at an international conference on adult illiteracy last year no official British representative was present.

The NIAE's research team, whose terms of reference included research on adult literacy, agreed with the BBC that it showed a "crass misunderstanding of adult education in general". The fact that people can't read is easily ascertainable but the reasons for it are not so obvious."

The terms of reference included the investigation of "any consequent social benefits of increased literacy in family, job, leisure and other relationships and life style". This implied that we know how people's leisure and life style are like before we start, and then follow them through "for the rest of their lives".

Mr Donald Moyle, reader in education at Edge Hill College of Higher Education, emphasized the need for operational objectives in teaching reading. Illiteracy could only be solved in the long term. We must define the range of purposes for which reading is used and the effectiveness of different levels of reading for different purposes.

Another vital area of research is why adults fail to learn to read. It is "very difficult to recreate what went wrong from the adults themselves".

"We need to know these things if we are to train literacy teachers effectively and provide adequate materials", Mr Moyle said.

'Unfair burden' on Stevas

Mr Norman St John-Stevas, Opposition spokesman on education, has been told by his predecessor, Mr William van Straubenzee, that he may have taken on too much as Tory spokesman for the arts as well as education.

Mr van Straubenzee—who was replaced by Mr St John-Stevas as education spokesman because, it was said, he did not take a hard enough line on comprehensives—warned that the Tories had a lot of work to do on the education front "and our leaders particularly so".

He told the Tory Reform Group: "I believe we are placing an unfair burden on one man to expect him to shadow so vast a subject as education and to combine it with the arts as well."

Mr Stevas, he said, had a heavy load in the frequent meetings of the team opposing the Government's Education Bill. He also needed to be visiting schools in all parts of the country, particularly those with social problems.

There were also Conservative members of local education authorities with whom he should be regularly in touch.

"It is not fair, on top of all this, which if done thoroughly is more than enough for one man, to expect him in addition to be concerned with the arts."

A guardsman from the Scots Guards talks to young people at the Invalid Children's Aid Association annual exhibition of art at the Royal Exchange, London. It was opened by Mrs Anne Armstrong, the American ambassador.

What black art can offer

The arts of ethnic minorities have "a vast amount" to give to the cultural life of Britain and could, given more support, do a great deal to encourage understanding and respect between different races, says a report published this week.

The Arts Britain Ignores, by Naseem Khan, describes the cultural activities of the main racial groups in Britain, assesses what they do and could achieve and concludes that there is very little contact between new and native British communities.

The author argues that ethnic arts need more financial and administrative support from local authorities, the Arts Council, community relations bodies, arts associations and centres and private patrons.

Naseem Khan is a journalist, a former theatre editor of Time Out and co-founder of The Hustler, a West London black newspaper. Her report was commissioned by the Arts Council, the Calouste Gulbenkian Foundation and the Community Relations Commission.

Dip HE advice for leavers

A leaflet about the Diploma in Higher Education was issued for school leavers this week by the Department of Education and Science. It explains that the diploma—a qualification awarded after two years' study—offers an alternative route to a degree and allows students to delay their final commitment to teacher training if they are unsure of their future.

The first two Dip HE courses began in 1974, a further nine started last year. Thirty-eight polytechnics and colleges are likely to run the courses.

Counselling high on cuts casualty list

by Jane Feinmann

Counselling in schools, which has become generally acceptable since courses for teachers were introduced at Keele and Reading Universities 11 years ago, is now likely to fall a victim to the education cuts.

This was stated at a press conference last week to mark publication of a pamphlet Concepts of Counselling, published by the Standing Conference for the Advancement of Counselling, which says that a trained counsellor has a particular contribution to make to a "freer and more liberal atmosphere which is quite essential if the implications of comprehensive education are to be thoroughly realized".

Mr E. A. Finch, head of Longslade Upper School, Leicester, who wrote the chapter on school counselling, said he knew of at least two l.e.a.s who were stopping employing counsellors. He had no reason to suppose they were not typical.

"It is a great pity if, as I suspect, there is gradual running down of counselling because of the squeeze, just when it was really getting off the ground."

A good school took the whole of a pupil's personality into account and did not merely concentrate on academic results. It should see education not as a commodity to be acquired once and for all but as an inevitably rather untidy process for every individual throughout life.

Trained counsellors could contribute to the establishment of this attitude not only by what they did themselves, but by the effect they had on other members of staff. The theoretical divorce between teaching and counselling would become more and more arbitrary as attitudes in education changed.

The good counsellor would have much the same qualities as a good teacher: "a readiness to accept pupils as individuals, a well balanced personality, a sense of humour, understanding, patience, approachability, integrity and an ability to listen".

The courses at Reading and Keele had many times more applicants than places in the last few years. This allowed the universities to be fairly choosy. The teachers who returned to the schools as trained counsellors were generally first rate.

A counsellor, said Mr Finch, should spend about half his time directly counselling his clients. His advice should be non-directive. He should act as a link man with helping agencies outside school and help with in-service training.

Mr Trefor Vaughan, lecturer and course tutor in adolescent development at the University of London Institute of Education, who edited the pamphlet, saw counselling as "a corrective to the forces of depersonalization in our society and also as a way of reaffirming a relationship of humanity between teacher and pupil".

Film gets limited showing

Juvenile Liaison, the controversial film on the work of Lancashire police with children in trouble, is to be made available to "specialist audiences", say the board of governors of the British Film Institute.

The BFI say there is an audience who have a professional interest in the subject matter of the film—police, probation officers, social workers and teachers.

They also think that because the film uses a particular documentary cinema technique, filmmakers, teachers and students studying films and film societies should be able to show Juvenile Liaison. The film will not be shown near Blackburn.

This follows protests by the police that the parents of the children concerned never agreed to public showings.

(DES LONG COURSE P32)
MANAGEMENT OF SCHOOLS

A COURSE FOR HEADS AND DEPUTIES OF SECONDARY SCHOOLS

which is designed to increase their understanding of the nature of school organisations and their management problems—particularly those arising from schools' reorganization and development.
The course is residential in rural Durham over three weeks, separate weeks being spaced over two terms. Over the past three years it has been run under the auspices of the LEAs in the Northern Region from which almost two hundred Heads and Deputies have attended. The courses continued in the Northern Region but are now made nationally available, four courses being arranged for the academic year 1976/77.

Discreet charms of the inquisitor

Philip Venning meets Janet Fookes, chairman of the lively parliamentary subcommittee on education

Aspiring educational pundits, self-publicists, windbags, and propagandizers, beware. However low an opinion you have of the education subcommittee of the House of Commons Expenditure Committee, you accept an invitation to appear before it at your peril.

The committee's chairman, the tough but charming Miss Janet Fookes, MP, has got your number—though of course she is far too polite and too professional to let it show. Too obviously, that is.

Week after week stone-walling civil servants, blinkered union leaders, and the rest of the educational circus go on parade before her committee on Monday afternoons.

And with a smile, a raised eyebrow and an appropriate simile, she uses gentle questioning to prick all the ritual statements and evasive replies she hears from them.

No one could have doubted her note of scepticism when she hinted to the National Union of Teachers that it was inconsistent to call for more consultation by the Department of Education and Science and at the same time refuse to consult over the Government's chief education policy—the cuts.

Nor is she averse to poking occasional fun at the committee itself. Commenting on a reply that it would be better if poor quality educational research was allowed to die decently in obscurity, she said: "Sometimes one finds that with regard to previous reports of this committee."

"It is no surprise to learn that précis work was her favourite activity at school. "I adored them. My school reports complained that my essays needed padding out."

Janet Fookes joined the education subcommittee in the last stages of its inquiry into further and higher education. It was the committee's second inquiry—the expenditure committee was a novelty introduced in 1970—and it taught valuable lessons for later work. The subject was altogether too large for an inexpert committee, and its recommendations were treated with barely concealed contempt by the DES.

But even though few of the committee's members have lasted for more than one session (Janet Fookes is very much the exception), the committee has become better at choosing rather more manageable subjects to look into.

After sitting on the inquiry into postgraduate education, and on the "quickie" into educational maintenance allowances, Janet Fookes took over as chairman of the committee in January 1975 when the next subject was charities—a report which made important recommendations on simplifying the definition of charitable purpose.

The present inquiry—which should come to an end in about four months' time—is rather different. It is into priorities and decision taking in the DES, and was prompted by a critical report about the DES by the OECD.

"The one we are doing is unusual", Miss Fookes said. "We are trying to work out how a department ticks rather than just gather factual information and draw conclusions as we did with the other inquiries." Nor will they ever know if they are successful.

The inquiry represents a further development by the Commons expenditure committee in the direction of American congressional committees which play such an important part in the American political system. Other subcommittees of the expenditure committee have already shown how this innovation has helped redress the fading powers of backbenchers.

They have also proved how effective specialist MPs can become once they sink their party differences. But the idea still has a long way to go.

Janet Fookes would like to see the expenditure committee strengthened, but as an adjunct to, rather than a rival of, the Chamber.

"I would think it is in a state of growth. It is a new concept and it will take some time to evolve the best way of working. What I would hope is that it will provide fodder to make the debates in the House more effective."

The old estimates committee, its predecessor, was too narrow, she believes, because it only looked at how money had been spent. The remit of the expenditure committee was much wider.

"I am sure it is a way of strengthening Parliament because knowledge is power. If one is thinking of trying to modify or curb government policy or action, you need to have facts at your disposal."

In her 10 years as a local councillor in Hastings she found that she always had contact with the officers. But at national level there was no way that backbenchers, even Government backbenchers, could meet civil servants. So one value of the committee was that it enabled her to talk to civil servants, albeit in a formal way.

Janet Fookes had set her sights on politics as a child in Hastings in the 1940s. Even when she went into teaching after taking a degree at Royal Holloway College, London University, she was planning to get to Westminster. "I always swore that the last thing I would ever be was a teacher. In fact I enjoyed it enormously."

But it was 12 years before she was elected as Tory MP for Merton and Morden in 1970. During that period she taught history and English in several small independent schools in the Sussex area, so as to allow her to serve as a Hastings councillor, and chairman of the education committee there from 1967 to 1970.

Her experience of education was a natural asset to the Conservatives who have always been short of practising teachers. So it was not surprising that as soon as she became an MP she was appointed one of the secretaries of the Conservative parliamentary education committee.

Mr Norman St John-Stevas, chairman of the Tory committee, has recently set up several working groups, and Janet Fookes is now chairing one that is looking at standards and discipline. But though she is reluctant to label herself politically, her views on education are probably closer to those of Dr Keith Hampson than Dr Rhodes Boyson or Mr St John-Stevas. They are conditioned by her conviction that all politics, education included, are complicated and can only be tackled with the weapon of knowledge.

"I tend by temperament to be a middle of the roader. Most subjects are complex. Extreme views rarely embrace all truth." It is her ability to avoid the simple answer and to make informed decisions which she regards as her greatest strength.

"I hope I have a fairly clear mind and a well balanced one. I hope I can take on board subjects, whether I'm relatively expert or not, and make a judgment. In politics you are lucky if you are an expert in as many as two fields—you need the kind of mind that can look at a subject which is unfamiliar and make a political judgment."

The private sessions of the expenditure committee bear out her beliefs. It is an all-party committee with quite a wide spread of political opinions—but there "is surprisingly little dissent".

"There is a willingness to work together and produce something acceptable to all. When you are studying something in depth, it does not lend itself to postures. You can lay down a few general principles but it gets much more difficult as soon as you go beyond that."

Merton and Morden constituency was chopped up by the boundary commission, and so in 1974 Janet Fookes was adopted as candidate for Plymouth Drake, a seat which she held in the October election by only 34 votes. Because the constituency is marginal, she inevitably has to spend a good deal of time nursing it. This has stimulated an interest in defence because it includes two commando units, the naval dockyards, an RAF station and several other military establishments.

Janet Fookes is clearly destined for ministerial office—a future Social Services Secretary, perhaps, or Minister of Defence. And she is not wasting time about learning all she can about Parliament and the job of an MP. She is already on the panel of committee chairmen, and her political career is decisively on the way up.

But she recognizes that her future depends very much on the whim of a handful of voters in Plymouth. "I believe it is a miracle being here. Even if I remain a backbencher I will be happy just being here."

Too much secret planning at DES

Lord Crowther-Hunt, former minister for higher education, this week criticizes the Department of Education's secret planning processes as "ill-equipped and ill-organized".

Too much planning is done in secret without any expert advice, he says in the first of three articles published today in The Times Higher Education Supplement.

There is not one educational expert in the planning unit. "It contains no educational psychologists or sociologists or professors or lecturers in education. Indeed, there is not a single psychologist or sociologist in the whole department!"

The planning unit is composed entirely of administrators who are primarily concerned with day-to-day work. During the 15 months in which Lord Crowther-Hunt was at the department three individuals held the top job of the planning unit: "hardly a recipe for being able to develop an awareness of new educational thinking let alone being able to contribute to it."

The recommendations of the 1968 Fulton report on the Civil Service, which said that education experts should be appointed, had not been carried into effect.

"A Fulton-type planning unit in the DES would have consisted of education experts of various kinds—perhaps led by a professor of education as the department's senior policy adviser with a status not inferior to that of the permanent secretary. And it would have included educational psychologists, educational economists, sociologists of different specialisms and others with relevant disciplines and fields of expertise.

"But the department's planning unit is naturally not at all like this. Its 14 members consist of an under-secretary, an assistant secretary, three principals, three higher executive officers, two executive officers, one clerical officer, one clerical assistant and two secretaries."

Lord Crowther-Hunt will be appearing before the education subcommittee of the House of Commons Expenditure Committee on Monday to answer questions about priorities and decision taking in the department. The sub-committee was set up after a critical report on the department by the Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development.

Crowther-Hunt: Experts kept out.

Fowler: Planning impractical.

Industry must have a say—Mr Fowler

Employers should go into the schools to convince both teachers and pupils of the importance of keeping up maths and science subjects for as long as possible, Mr Gerry Fowler, the minister in charge of higher education, said last week.

He told the Standing Conference of Employers of Graduates that employers had a proper interest in wanting to guide the career, and therefore the educational, choices of schoolchildren.

"Because of early specialization, effective career choices are often made at too early an age. Employers perhaps more than anyone else can get across to those who are faced with such choices the advantages of particular careers and the importance of keeping up certain disciplines, such as mathematics and at least one science, in order to facilitate entry into and development within those careers."

The freedom of pupils to choose their secondary school subjects usually meant freedom for their parents or their teachers to choose. Too many pupils gave up too early subjects which were essential if they were to have a wide choice of careers.

Mr Fowler told the employers that the idea of adjusting the intake of higher education to meet estimated manpower needs in the future was impractical. This was an idea floated by his predecessor, Lord Crowther-Hunt.

There would always be a poor match between the output of first degree graduates and the needs of industry. With a worsening economic climate, graduates were increasingly calling for courses that were directly relevant to the needs of employment.

But it was not obvious that technology, or even science in general, were the only relevant subjects. "Industry needs its due supply of responsible and enlightened young people educated to consider problems dispassionately and to reach conclusions on evidence rather than prejudice."

Instead of expecting first degrees to provide young employees with specialist skills, employers should rely on postgraduate or post-experience courses. Provided employers kept the education system well fed with up-to-date information it was much easier to match the output of postgraduate and post-experience courses to their needs.

Crash courses in languages

Secondary pupils in Inner London are being offered crash courses in a second foreign language. The courses, organized by two polytechnics, will take place in July after the summer exams.

They aim to take 105 students from scratch to a sound working knowledge of Spanish, German, Russian or Italian, in 10 sessions of five hours, using the latest language teaching techniques.

The Central London and South Bank polytechnics are financing the two-week courses themselves, and staff are giving up their own time to teach the classes.

Students will be selected for their "aptitude and interest in the study of a first foreign language" but who have no opportunity for learning a second. They need not intend to specialize in languages.

The aim is to stimulate more interest in foreign languages among entrants to all sorts of trades and industries. If the experiment is successful it may be expanded next year.

Short cut to an OU degree

Students at Birmingham Polytechnic can now take a short cut to an Open University degree. A new joint scheme between the poly and the university awards successful students a teaching certificate and five out of the six credits needed for a degree.

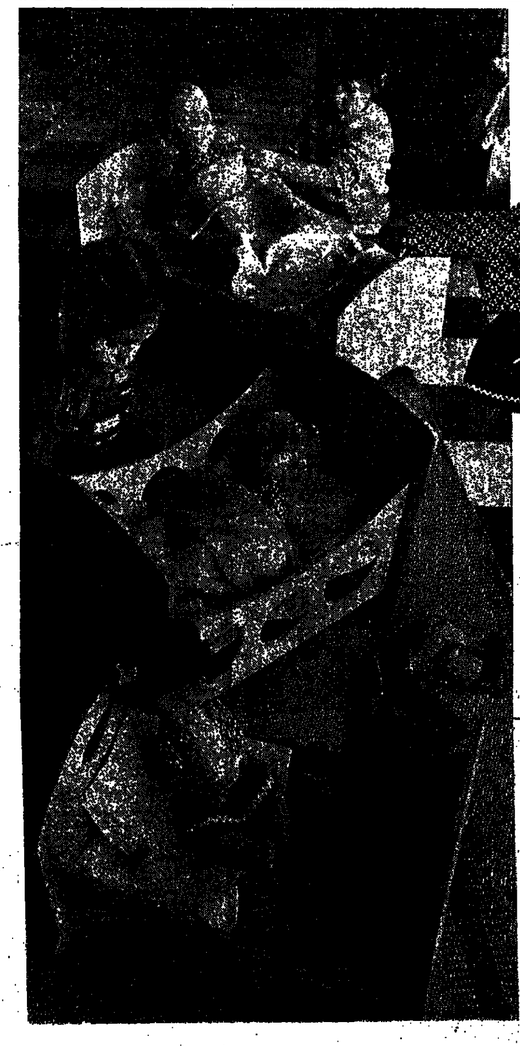
The course starts in September and new students will study a university foundation course as part of their teaching certificate. Those who do well can enter another university course in their third year and complete their sixth credit a few months after leaving the polytechnic.

The scheme is the second example of collaboration between the university and a teacher training institution. Milton Keynes college of education entered into a similar arrangement last year.

Applied geography

A degree course for those who want to do geography and not just study it starts at Huddersfield Polytechnic in September. By concentrating on practical and vocational skills, the applied geography course will prepare students for a variety of jobs in recreation, transport or water management and central or local government planning.

These skills include the use of the computer, the gathering of information and methods of monitoring environments and the needs of communities.



Arnold help build the foundations of learning with materials for structured play

Arnold have paid particular attention to the careful structuring of a number of products in order to meet the needs of the more structured approach to play activity in nursery schools.

For example, the new range off dolls, beds, clothes and bedclothes in three sizes has been designed to help children acquire basic mathematical concepts, through play.

Arnold's Sand Set and Water Play Set materials have been selected to enable teachers to organise and structure a variety of activities. The new, unique, circular water trough in clear acrylic plastic, allows children to investigate and observe basic concepts such as variation in depth, floating and sinking, etc.

Please complete the coupon for further information.

Arnold give them the tools of learning.

to whom applications should be submitted as soon as possible.

Middlesex Polytechnic

Certificate in Education
(University of London)

a part-time course for full-time teachers in Further Education

Intended for teachers already working in institutions of further education, this course
- aims to improve teaching techniques by studying both the theory and practice of education
- leads to qualified teacher status
- requires attendance for one day a week (Friday) for five terms, followed by one term of full-time block release secondment
- is held at our Hendon location in north-west London, close to Hendon Central Underground and West Hendon BR stations

You can apply now to start this September. Write or telephone for further details and an application form : Mrs Doris E. McLoughlin, Middlesex Polytechnic (Ref. C09A), The Burroughs, Hendon NW4 4BT ; 01-202 6545; extn. 230.

The POLYTECHNIC WOLVERHAMPTON

Why not a Polytechnic?

When talking to your sixth formers why not consider polytechnics? They offer a wide range of courses with the possibility of transfers between different types for those with second thoughts.

At the Polytechnic, Wolverhampton, we offer school-leavers a selection of degree and diploma courses profiting from strong links with the industry, commerce and arts of the West Midlands Conurbation, namely :

Degree Courses
Biological Sciences, Business Studies, Ceramics, Combined Studies (Sciences, Economics, Engineering, Computing), Computer Science, Economics, Fine Art, Graphic Design, Humanities (including Language and Literature, History, Geography), Languages and European Studies, Law, Mechanical Engineering, Three Dimensional Design (Wood, Metals, Plastics).

Diploma Courses
Applied Biology, Building, Building Production and Control, Business Studies, Civil Engineering, Languages for Business, Mechanical Engineering, Public Administration.

Inter-Faculty Course
Diploma of Higher Education.

First shots in battle for top INTO job

from our correspondent

This year's crop of teacher conferences produced little out of the ordinary, partly because many of the battles were internal ones. Within the Irish National Teachers' Organization, for example, the final reverberations of the debate about new boards of management for primary schools have still not died down.

When they were proposed two years ago by Mr Richard Burke, the Minister for Education, the INTO leadership were in something of a quandary. To the left was a small but vocal group who wanted to reject as undemocratic the minister's formula for two parents and four representatives of the church managers. To the right was a rather larger body of teachers who were deeply suspicious of the whole idea of parent involvement, and scared that it might end up with parents pushing their noses into areas which were the teachers' prerogative, particularly the curriculum.

A special delegate conference ordered the union executive to fight for a different formula : two parents, two church representatives, and two teachers. But the executive knew the churches would never surrender effective control and so they sidestepped the order from the special conference and put new proposals to a postal ballot of the membership.

The new proposals, which have token teacher representation, have now been accepted. One of the INTO's less widely publicized successes, however, was to incorporate in the deal a new system of teacher appointment which effectively rules out the Department of Education's traditional "short list" of candidates deemed suitable for the job.

The new system will probably end up reinforcing the patronage of each school principal—and part of the educational history of the past 30 years has been the way in which INTO have gradually secured the transfer of power away from the clerical manager and into the hands of the school principals. This, indeed, was one of the reasons why so many INTO members were unwilling to abandon the system they had conquered in favour of one which was untried.

One of the men who has presided over this process is Senator Sean Brosnahan, INTO general secretary, who is expected to retire next year. This year's conference saw the first discreet shots in the battle for the succession. There are two principal contenders : Mr Tom Gilmorie, an executive member from Dublin whose strength, as well as his vulnerability, lies in his close association with executive policy and with the outgoing secretary ; and Mr Gerry Quigley, the union's northern secretary, who is less well known in the Republic but who has built up an enviable reputation as an administrator and negotiator.

The secondary teachers' conference produced strong evidence that the more militant wing of the Association of Secondary Teachers (Ireland) is now a force to be reckoned with. In the past they have tended to be long on rhetoric and short on action. Members, who have very little contractual protection, have always taught in schools in which hiring and firing was an arbitrary exercise carried out by clerical managers. Promotion, too, tended to be a reward for conformity. Few people were tempted to step out of line.

Another factor making for quiescence was that many union members were former students of the major seminary at Maynooth, who, after getting their primary degree there, decided to opt for teaching rather than the priesthood.

For some time, a more radical group has been preoccupied with consolidating a less gentlemanly spirit to industrial action and they have been looking for an issue on which they could be sure the union would take a stand.

The issue of principalships—currently restricted to members of religious orders—seems to be an ideal one. There is a lot of money involved (more than £500,000 is paid by the Department of Education every year in principals' allowances) and this makes the prospect of victory even sweeter.

Once that has been achieved, however, members of ASTI will find themselves with the same problem which has faced the Teachers Union of Ireland in recent years and which raised its head again at this year's TUI conference: the problem of running a union in a school when both principal and assistant teachers are union members.

This has led to a lot of friction. There is even an association for TUI members who are school principals, but it has so far remained within the framework of the parent organization. An attempt to set up a similar sub-grouping for primary school principals within INTO received short shrift last year.

One of the lesser known conferences was for the religious orders of nuns who own and manage some of the Republic's largest primary schools. The president of this organization criticized recent moves to establish multi-denominational primary schools, alleging that to take religion out of education was to be profoundly anti-educational.

Relatively few of the proponents of multi-denominational education, in fact, are calling for wholly secular schools. Most of them envisage schools in which religious instruction would continue to be given, but on a denominationally segregated basis and possibly after normal school hours. Some communities looking for multi-denominational schools, far from seeking to exclude religion from the school, have been trying to exchange the present single-denominational management system for one in which the official representatives of three or four churches operate as a joint management committee.

Society 'built on sand'

by Paul McGill

Society is now built on sand a there can be no solution to vand ism and indisciplne until pare restore discipline and respect, Hilbert Watson, president of Ulster Teachers' Union, said t week.

Speaking at the union's ann conference at Newcastle, co Do he said that while Northern Ire shared the problems of vandal and indiscipline with other c tries, the province had its spe problems. For example, 11 ; nites had been charged with mur last year.

"I, and I am sure you, too, horrified by the dreadful murd and assassinations so commonp in this land. Four valiant mem of this union have been victim have many of our former pupils.

He wondered if the educati system had filled children w "frustration and evil intent" a discipline in schools had become staff. "Have we been trying t too much for our young, so having little or nothing to d themselves, they become bored rebellious ? Has the influence the irreplacable love of the dece discipline and Christian mo departed from the home ? Do dren still learn prayers at mothe knee ? Are they encouraged to to a place of worship, accompani by their parents, on the Sabb day ?

"Are fathers and mothers tired in the evening or are t too engrossed in watching the v lence, drinking and sex on televis to have time and patience to com and direct the energies of their springs into useful channels or they think that it is the job voluntary youth leaders ?

"Our jails are full and more being built, while our churches empty and are being sold off. On rare occasion when the culprit caught he gets a pat on the ha instead of a whack on the tail, a is told to be good by those in co mand. Society has now a foun tion of sand.

"The forces of law and ord seem unable to apply much comm and can not, until parents rest proper standards of discipline a respect in the home, complemente by a united and determined effo to regain standards in schools."

The outgoing president accept that with the current economi situation some cuts in spendi were necessary. He complained th a service which catered directly f the nation's future prosperity shou have to bear a disproportionate share of the economies.

"Have we got our priorit right ? £246m was handed out overseas aid and 63 per cent that vast sum was in the form gifts. Thirty-four million pound was recently given to Bangladesh I am all for deserving charities b my Mum taught me that charity begins at home."

Discussion on the 21 resolution tabled for the conference aroused little controversy, 18 of them being carried unanimously. These included a condemnation of cuts in educational spending, a call for talks leading to the establishment of a teachers registration council, a plea for the setting up of special centres for disruptive pupils and a motion deploring the reduction in teacher education intakes.

In brief

PAT to the rescue

The Professional Association of Teachers are to run a 10-day course next year on discipline and the disruptive pupil. Mr Ian Mitchell Lambert, chairman of the association, said the course would provide teachers with training in classroom skills which they should have been taught at college.

Local history

Textiles, by W. T. Cowhig, the second in a series of local history publications, has been produced by the Greater Manchester Council at 75p. Canals and waterways, by A. H. Body, has already been published.

Trade unionists' course

Students are now being enrolled for a second series of the Polytechnic of Central London's course for trade unionists. The course has been designed primarily for branch officers, shop stewards and full-time union staff members.

Country style

Kench Hill, an eighteenth-century building near Fenterden, Kent, is to become the ILEA's first divisional residential centre. It will serve secondary schools in the Hackney area, taking up to 35 pupils and accompanying teachers for a week in an environment which contrasts sharply with the inner city.

DIANE SPENCER visits Saxon Wood assessment centre for physically handicapped

Partnership with parents is a well-worn phrase in reports and conferences, apart from evidence to the Warnock Committee on special education. Usually it is little more than a pious hope.

At Saxon Wood, a school and assessment centre for physically handicapped children at Basingstoke, the phrase is put into practice. The school, in the grounds of Basingstoke District Hospital, is funded by the Spastics Society but run by the local education authority. Medical staff are provided by the hospital as are school meals.

The 30 pupils come from nursery school age until they are seven. The school aims to place a child in an appropriate school as soon as his capabilities are assessed. Some stay for two years, others for a few months. As well as the full-time pupils, 30 more attend part-time with their parents for special training in feeding or therapy.

Helen, for example, goes to a school for the severely mentally handicapped. She is nine, but looks half her age. She is a pretty child, although severely spastic, unable to walk, talk or see very well. But according to Miss Thelma Gibbons, the teacher in charge of the school, her family have come to terms with her handicap.

They have realized that they cannot cope with Helen all the time, so she spends a week at a residential home every five weeks or so, to give the family a welcome break.

Unfortunately, she often refuses food when anyone else tries to feed her, so she comes to Saxon Wood twice a week for physiotherapy and training in feeding. Helen's mother enjoys helping the other children with their meals, joins in attempts to get Helen to crawl with the aid of a walking frame and relaxes in the parents' room with other mothers.

This room, cosier than the next door staffroom, is open to any visiting parent and is crammed with notices about the Saxon Wood Association.

This is such a flourishing concern that they have turned themselves into a charity. They raise money to buy equipment as well as for outings and social events. Babysitting is a very valuable service also run by the association.

Although the school, started two years ago and formally opened last month, is well equipped, money will soon be needed for expensive items such as an enlarged keyboard typewriter. At a cost of £500, this will help a spastic girl to write—and this is likely to be her best means of communication.

The school's latest toy is a pointer communication board. This looks like a hexagonal blank-face clock with one hand and a small flat board with a metal strip mounted on it. Pictures or words can be placed on the face and the child presses the strip until the pointer reaches the appropriate word of picture. This helps the child to control his movements and to recognize shapes.

Saxon Wood attaches great importance to social training during the day. The cloakroom area is in the centre of the bright one-storey building for teeth cleaning and washing at lunch time.

"Parents often think that incontinence is part of the handicap", said Miss Gibbons. "But with a strict routine it can be overcome." Cooperation with parents is vital as a lot of work done in school can be undermined by parents at home.

One boy with spina bifida was over-indulged by his parents and spent his time watching television. Now his mobility has improved and quiet hints have ensured greater activity at home.

Parents are visited before their children go to the school. Miss Gibbons likes to meet them on their own territory.

They also benefit from the school's holiday system. Every five weeks they have a one-week holiday, which allows parents to spend time with the rest of the family during the remainder of the normal school holidays or to give exclusive attention to the handicapped child when the others are at school.

Miss Diana Jordan

Sir Alec Clegg writes :

Miss Diana Jordan, the first warden of Woolley Hall, near Wakefield, Yorkshire, died last week in hospital in Hereford after an illness of several months.

The part she played in the development of modern dance, and in the establishment of the first residential teachers' centre in the country, was of national significance and was recognized by her OBE.

She trained as a teacher of physical education at Bedford College, but in her earliest years she rebelled against the absence of an imaginative element in the work she did.

To make good what she believed to be a serious deficiency she went abroad to work with Mary Wigman, a distinguished pupil of Rudolf Laban, in what was in those days known as central European dancing. Progress in this field was held back by the war years when Miss Jordan became its first warden. It was in this post that she made her most significant impression. Her sensitivity, her insistence on quality, her ability to work with people and gain their confidence, and her utter faith in the teachers of the county, made Woolley Hall a place to which teachers wished to go. All who met her and worked with her will remember her with affection and gratitude.

included Miss Jordan, Miss Lisa Uhlmann and Miss Joan Goodrich, HMI, became responsible for the annual courses which eventually established modern dance in its own right in many secondary schools and which, by the introduction of a dance and drama element into the primary schools, modified the physical education which these schools provided in a way which was particularly valuable to the physically inept.

In the late 1940s Miss Jordan became a physical education adviser in the West Riding, where she played a significant and major part in the planning of two new colleges of education, one dealing with physical education at Wentworth Woodhouse, and the other with music, art and drama at Bretton Hall.

In 1952 the authority established a residential centre at Woolley Hall for the in-service training of its teachers, and Miss Jordan became its first warden. It was in this post that she made her most significant impression. Her sensitivity, her insistence on quality, her ability to work with people and gain their confidence, and her utter faith in the teachers of the county, made Woolley Hall a place to which teachers wished to go. All who met her and worked with her will remember her with affection and gratitude.

Success

In little more than two weeks Pennine, the Bradford commercial radio station, claims to have persuaded more than 250 people with reading and writing difficulties to apply for tuition under the adult illiteracy scheme. Pennine also say they found 40 tutors.

Careers in music

A two-day course in music as a career is to be held at the Polytechnic of Central London on May 15 and 16. Speakers will include David Willcocks, principal of the Royal College of Music, and Arthur Lewins, leader of the BBC Concert Orchestra.

OU offer

The one year Open University courses Methods of Educational Enquiry and Technology for Teachers are again being offered to students in the 1977 session. Applications before October 15, to the Post-experience Student Office, The Open University, PO Box 76, Walton Hall, Milton Keynes, MK7 6AA.

Design winners

Travelling scholarships worth £250 each were presented this week to Mrs Pamela Hambledon and Mr John Dennison, designers for Royal Doulton Tableware Ltd, at North Staffordshire Polytechnic, Stoke-on-Trent. They were winners of a British Ceramic Manufacturers' Federation design competition.

People

Professor B. G. Gowenlock, professor of chemistry, Heriot-Watt University, Edinburgh, and Dr Elizabeth Anne Whiteman, vice-principal of Lady Margaret Hall, Oxford, are to be members of the University Grants Committee.

Mr Allen Greenwood, chairman of the British Aircraft Corporation, is to be chairman of Remploy. This Government-sponsored organization provides sheltered employment for about 8,400 severely disabled.

Appointments

Universities

Professor John Horlock, vice-chancellor of Salford University, to a personal chair at the university.

Dr J. E. Flower, reader in French, University of East Anglia, to the chair of French, Exeter University.

Dr. A. F. G. Wyatt, senior lecturer in physics, Nottingham University, to the chair of physics, Exeter University.

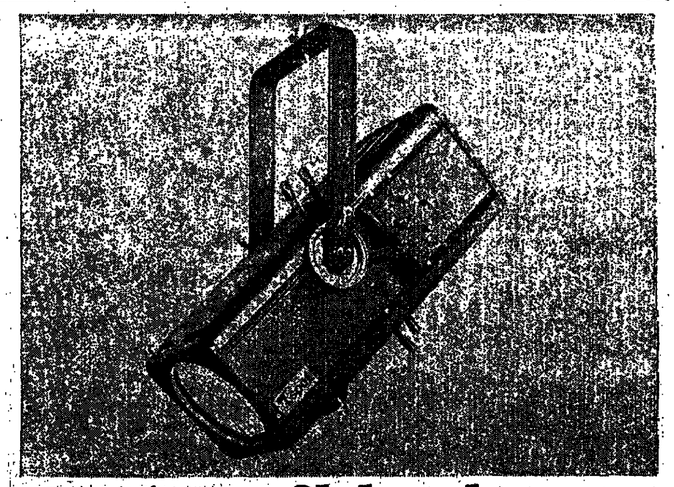
Mr M. G. Brock, vice-president and bursar of Wolfson College, Oxford, to a chair of education, Exeter University.

Dr R. E. Allsopp, director of the Transport Operations Research Group, Newcastle University, to the chair of transport studies, University College, London University.

Dr R. J. Berry, lecturer in the Sir William Dunn School of Pathology, Oxford University, to a chair of oncology, Middlesex Hospital Medical School, London University.

Professor M. J. Hillier Smith, professor of biochemical pharmacology, King's College Hospital Medical School, London University, to the chair of Chemical Pathology at the school.

Dr J. A. N. Corsellis, consultant neuropathologist, Runwell Hospital, to the chair of neuropathology, Institute of Psychiatry, London University.



Our new profile knocks spots off the competition.

If you're looking for some replacement spotlights but find the cost alarming, take a look at the Rank Strand T-Spot.

It's a new 1000 watt Halogen luminaire which uses the light more efficiently than other 1000 watt Halogen profile spots.

And obviously, this increase in efficiency could result in you saving money.

The T-Spot also incorporates a beam-shaping system which allows an infinitely variable permutation of shapes, and hard or soft beam edges.

All this is based upon a computer-designed optical system contained in a full-length housing, which eliminates stray light.

The T-Spot is everything you'd expect from Europe's most experienced stage lighting manufacturer, and if you'd like to know more, simply give us a ring.

It could be most illuminating.

Virtue in 'stillness'

Children and their teachers from Inner London schools packed the Great Hall of County Hall recently to hear from Mr Dorian Williams, president of the London Schools' Horse Society, of great horses and riders he knew during his period as chief BBC commentator on show-jumping and other equestrian activities.

Among the greatest riders he put Peter Robeson, "classically correct and totally painstaking". Pat Smythe, "tremendous dedication and skill," and Colonel Frank Weldon "the greatest event rider I have seen." Among the horses were Kilbarrie (Col. Weldon), Laurieston (Richard Meade), Sea Breeze (Mike Bullen) and the 14.2 hands pony Stroller "for his amazing gymnastic ability and courage".

He regarded David Broome as the best of the contemporary show-jump riders, his great qualities being perfect sense of timing, "marvellously clever hands", and his "stillness". Stillness and quietness were the qualities which put a horse into the right frame of mind.

"A horse in the right frame of mind will go on for ever, but an unhappy horse will always be trouble." Perhaps the same could be said of human beings.

Germans take top volleyball prize

Speedwell School, Bristol, came fifth in both sections of the international schools volleyball tournament in Holland and immediately on returning home, went into action in the big Invo 76 tournament which the school runs during the Easter holiday.

The two Speedwell teams, despite their strenuous efforts in Holland, each took third place in the Invo competitions. The winners of both the junior men and junior women's tournaments were the Dutch club Smash-In. The senior men's event was won by Paderborne, from West Germany, and the women's by the London team.

Nearly 500 volleyballers from Belgium, Holland, West Germany, Sweden and Britain competed in Bristol, a considerable organizational feat.

Badminton finals

The busy schools badminton season draws to a close tomorrow with the finals of the Top School tournament at the Abbey Stadium, Redditch. Three titles are at stake—mixed, boys' and girls' all at under-16 level.

Henry Cavendish School (Derby) will defend their boys' title and will try to add the mixed prize to it. In both sections they will be opposed by Erith School, Kent.

A third school going for a double is Thorpe Grammar School, Norwich, who are tackling the mixed and the girls' events.

Suzanne in line for third crown

Suzanne Hunt (Kesteven and Grantham Grammar School) defends her under-16 title at the Sign English schools table tennis championships at Luton Sports Centre tomorrow. If she succeeds, it will be her third consecutive title. She was junior champion in 1974.

Douglas Johnson, of Washwood Heath Comprehensive School, winner of the boys' under-16 event last year, is favourite this time to take the senior title. Ranked sixth among England's juniors, he is top seeded for Luton.

There are 253 entries, 33 more than last year, and a place in the 42-strong team to play Scotland in June is among the rewards.

Eye on the rules

The latest edition of the Official Rules of Sports and Games, the twelfth since it began in 1949, is as usual a valuable book to have around wherever several sports are practised; 26 major and minor sports, from archery to water polo, are dealt with in its 862 pages.

However, for greater school use the publishers should consider a break from the present format to include the rules of sports such as mini basketball, mini volleyball, mini rugby, five and six-a-side football, eight-a-side cricket.

Two weeks in Spain for £39? What kind of holiday are you going to get for that?

rooted to the spot if you prefer—with a return jet ticket in your pocket, a nightly roof over your head and the days in front of you your own.

And all from £35 for one week or a preposterous £39 for two. With a very top ceiling of £65 for two high-season weeks on the Costa del Sol.

How's it done?

By the forfeit of a few home comforts. What we've done is to sort out a total of 59 hostels and pensions throughout the northern, central and Andalucian regions of the mainland, as well as Majorca, Minorca and Ibiza, and arranged simple, bed-only accommodation there through the season.

And though the standard varies, some are very simple indeed. So simple we recommend you bring a sleeping bag and don't expect too much in the way of bath en suite.

Guaranteed flights, guaranteed prices.

Flights are going to be leaving at the rate of 67 a week from 9 local airports, starting on 2nd May.

And there's going to be no will-they-won't-they about them taking off. Every flight till the end of the high season is fully guaranteed by Thomson Holidays, Britain's leading holiday company.

Not only that. Fly before the end of June and the price itself is under guarantee.

Where do you go from here?

Apart from Spain there's still Greece, Corfu and Crete from last year's wildly successful programme, and now Yugoslavia, Italy, Sicily, Austria and Switzerland as well.

And while with no accommodation to book, only a plane seat, there's always a good chance of a last-minute reservation, seats are by no means unlimited and you'd be wise to book up before too many others cotton on.

Your nearest travel agent or Spanish Tourist Office has the leaflets, or ring one of the numbers below.

Republic of Ireland

Union condemns cramming as 'unprofessional'

DUBLIN

The growing practice of "cramming" students for State examinations has come under heavy fire from the Association of Secondary Teachers (Ireland), whose members teach certificate classes in a majority of the Republic's post-primary schools.

In a report of a subcommittee set up especially to examine the problem, the practice is condemned as being unprofessional, and union members who engage in it—except, in special circumstances, with the consent of the pupil's parents and his normal form teacher—are criticized for breaching professional ethics.

Cramming schools have in fact become an increasingly familiar part of the educational scene in the Republic in recent years, particularly in the wake of the inexorable increase in the standard required for university entry. Although the normal minimum standard for an open-entry faculty like arts is still only two honours at leaving certificate level, most entrants' qualifications are higher.

In the more competitive faculties, such as medicine and law, good examination results are at a premium. To meet these needs, and the needs of students who may simply be worried about passing the leaving certificate in a sufficient number of subjects to impress a prospective employer, a number of cramming schools have been created.

Generally, these schools operate after normal school hours, and their staffs frequently include highly qualified secondary teachers who also hold full-time teaching positions in ordinary schools, but who are prepared to put in up to five or six extra hours a day in return for the very substantial rewards offered.

Teaching is often done in one-and-a-half-hour units, for which the teacher will be paid anything between £5 and £7. Some teachers may do as many as three such units in a night. The students pay £1.50 or so per subject per session —less if they are doing more than one at the same time. Even so, an intensive one-week course in two or three subjects could easily end up costing £15. And, with class sizes of between 30 and 40 students, one establishment is reputed to be grossing in the region of £8,000-£9,000 a week.

The ASTI is understandably worried by the effect of an extra workload like this on their members, and on its implications for their normal teaching. The schools themselves, while generally tending to ignore the existence of the cramming schools, rarely encourage pupils who have failed to achieve a sufficiently high standard to come back for an extra year, and in some cases are probably just as happy that the cramming schools exist to divert pressure from their own facilities.

Adult 'distance learning' gets major boost

A new institution to provide and coordinate distance teaching, particularly that for adults, has been outlined in recently published Government plans. The new body will use radio and television programmes, film, videotape and cassettes as well as conventional correspondence school tuition methods to provide a range of courses up to university-entrance standard.

Some courses will prepare students for existing examinations, such as the school-leaving exam, while others will not lead to specific qualifications. The institution will not set any exams or provide any qualifications of its own.

A central objective will be to provide teaching for adults in need of re-training because of changed working or social circumstances. Other target groups include seamen, handicapped people unable to attend ordinary schooling and foreign workers and their families.

Government fights off middle school opposition

A motion in the Upper House by the conservative Liberal Party (VVD) condemning the proposed establishment of secondary middle schools, which would be obligatory for all 12 to 16-year-olds, has been defeated by 40 to 31 votes (TES April 30).

Opponents of the schools believe that they would endanger the principle of free educational choice set out in the Constitution.

If the Government continues with its plan, the Constitution will have to be changed accordingly. But it is doubtful if Parliament would approve the change by the required two-thirds majority.

The middle school is scheduled to become the cornerstone of Dutch education after the year 2000. Its main advantage, according to its supporters, will be that pupils will be able to postpone their choice of further study or vocation until the age of 16.

John Cleverley, recently in Peking, reports on the educational implications of the Chinese power struggle

Radicals will press ahead with plans for cementing work/study links

The continuing struggle in the Chinese leadership, marked by the fall of Teng Hsiao-ping, has major implications for the future of radical policies in education. During 1975, a challenge was mounted by a group opposed to the post-Cultural Revolution reforms. Its leaders, Chou Jung-hsin, the Minister of Education, and Liu Ping, the deputy party secretary at Tsinghua University, have now been openly charged with the Teng crime of taking "a rightist deviationist line".

The minister and Liu Ping are represented as turning the clock back to the early sixties by trying to abolish reforms like two years' work experience following secondary school, political criteria determining university entry, non-expert government in educational institutions and physical labour for all.

However, these changes are popular with many, not least because today's education is associated with China's spectacular technological successes, national stability and her growing international respectability. There is little grass roots support for the critics.

I found Chinese teachers much more confident than on my last visit in 1972 when the Cultural Revolution was still a recent event. Material conditions have improved. Admittedly rationing continues in grain, animal fats and cotton, but the shops have the goods to tempt, and a married couple both teaching can buy a television with their annual savings, or bank their money at 4 per cent. There is no inflation.

Differences in income levels are integral to Chinese society at present, with the policy clearly stated: "to each according to his work". Peasants on poorer communes share their poverty; city officials do much better, albeit with some guilt feelings.

Since the Cultural Revolution, party branches have re-established themselves at all educational levels. The big loser is the People's Liberation Army whose uniforms have virtually disappeared from the school administration scene.

The gap in management left by the PLA has been partly filled by worker teams under last year's "dictatorship of the proletariat" campaign, and by greater professional representation. None the less the revolutionary committees which run the schools are firmly under the direction of the party branches.

After the welcoming speeches, the visitor's first stop in a Chinese school three years ago was towards the classroom. Today it is into the school factory which is being extended and diversified with some schools introducing assembly-line techniques. Older students are spending from a quarter to a third of their time outside the classroom and block time for school children in factories and the countryside has become standard.

Factories themselves have become more attuned to taking students. For instance, the Wuhan Heavy Machine Plant attaches students to retired workers, has guidelines for factory-school responsibility, offers graded work experience programmes, and has a scheme for reporting back on individuals.

The various "integration with society" programmes have encountered snags. Some factories refuse to cooperate if this means slowing production, or they engage students only for manual work. Peasants, already fully extended, can find these exercises an additional burden. The considerable time spent on practical work is resented by some teachers who would separate theory and practice and reduce the latter. A few even consider statements like "theses are bundles of waste paper without practical use" expressions of anti-intellectualism. Liu Ping of Tsinghua was scathing about the present crop of university graduates, describing them as "unable to read a book".

School emphasis is heavily on the practical.

Selection procedures for further education continue to put political reliability first, with academic ability underplayed. Some universities require no more than a cursory look at school records and a short discussion with the candidate before approving entry. But with tertiary education highly selective, and an enormous pool of talent, the very able still find their way to the top.

While the academic levels reached by some students is giving concern, by and large the Chinese think the cost worth it.

The practice of taking in unqualified older peasants and workers for largely ideological reasons has been abandoned in undergraduate courses; however, many short programmes are still mounted for them.

The present policy is to encourage students to return to the factories and communes from whence they came. At Chiao Tung University, Sian, the authorities required permission from the home factory before they could retain a talented student for post-graduate study.

The universal practice of requiring two or more years' work from high school graduates before entry to tertiary education ensures that all students now fit the category of "worker, peasant, soldier students". Thus the old charge that the universities are filled with bourgeois students has lost its force.

In the early seventies, the future of the May 7 schools, where teachers and officials were subject to a regime of physical labour and political study, was in doubt due to excesses of enthusiasm, and their separation from peasant life. However, a proven capacity to cleanse inmates politically now sees them in great demand.

Offices and universities have formed their own May 7 schools, and the waiting lists are up to five years. Their managers lecture new recruits on the spinelessness of talk of hardship from the office armchair, making the point that the discomforts they feel when lined up in uniforms shouldering spades is sure proof of a need for re-education.

Extension in another form has come with the growing acceptance of the six-day boarding kindergarten. Parents are coming to acknowledge that such kindergartens are not emotionally disadvantageous. For their part the kindergartens have adopted more purposeful programmes. At the "East is Red" kindergarten in Canton it was explained that the slogan before the Cultural Revolution was "play well and keep well". Now it is "study well and make daily progress".

The quest for more acceptable examining in educational institutions continues. The Shianti Road Primary School, Sian, was attempting an experiment by bringing into the classroom a soldier, worker and an educated youth to comment on the essays of pupils just returned from the countryside. A 10-year-old girl read out her essay and the soldier, who turned out to be the father of the girl, assessed it.

"I was very pleased to come to this meeting. This is the correct line of Chairman Mao. I'm sure I can learn a great deal from it. I was too busy to read her article beforehand. After the Cultural Revolution teaching and study skills have greatly increased. A child of 10 can make a clear distinction of what road to go. She is determined to integrate with the broad masses. This is because she is not confined to the classroom and can learn from society. This is why she can write a composition with a political theme. It is not only the teachers but we parents who should support revolutionary actions."

Classroom discussion followed with minor grammatical errors pointed out. Next the class was asked to suggest a mark, one pupil said 99 per cent, another 98. The girl replied "I have no objection to getting 98". The teacher approved, and another pupil stood up. With 30 minutes a candidate, and a class of 50, only a minority had been assessed by mid-week. Judging by the glazed eyes, the evaluations had a measure of sameness.

If the radical left triumphs in the leadership issue, the future will see the schools press further into the uncharted area of work experience. Already the better-off and well-connected urban schools are establishing rural branches where students can spend two months a year in farm work and related academic study.

Unesco top team completed

Mr Amadou-Mahtar M'Bow, Unesco director-general, has named two more Assistant Directors General and thus completed the seven-member cabinet he has been forming since his appointment 18 months ago.

Mrs Martha Hildebrant of Peru is the new ADG for social sciences since 1972 she has been director of her country's National Institute of Culture and before that she directed social science programmes at San Marcos University, Lima.

The new ADG for culture and communication is Mr Makaminan Makeliansae of Indonesia. He was for some years his country's director-general of education.

The other ADGs are: for education, Mr Simona Yanguiane, Soviet Union; for natural sciences, Mr Abdul Razzuk Kaddoura, Syria; for programme support and administration, Mr Jacques Rigaud, France; and for cooperation and external relations, Mr Dragoljub Najman, Yugoslavia.

Nursery hopes for working parents

Italy

Elections will mean more hold-ups to reforms

from Dalbert Hallenstein

VERONA

Last Saturday's decision to dissolve Parliament and hold general elections on June 20 means that several already long-delayed educational reforms now have no hope of being enacted for months, or even years.

The reforms of Italy's crumbling university and secondary school systems are the most important of these. But, for constitutional reasons, all the various educational reform Bills now under discussion at parliamentary committee level will have to be re-presented and rediscussed again from the beginning when the new legislature assembles.

Newly-elected Italian Parliaments are notorious for the interminable delays involved in appointing not only a Government, but also the dozens of committees necessary to finally begin the task of legislating, so that with the coming summer holidays and the time-consuming tradition of haggling for positions of power, serious work will almost certainly not begin until at least October.

If, however, the electorate swings decisively to the left, and a strong Socialist/Communist Government is formed, all the traditional delays might be overcome.

The long legislative vacuum caused by the coming elections could also affect a number of half-completed reforms. These include the long-delayed holding of elections to appoint hundreds of school district councils. These will be responsible, among many other things, for the immediate spending of £1,200m allocated for an ambitious school building programme.

Plans to complete the decentralization and reform of vocational training could also be seriously hampered by delays in vital Government legislation.

The renewal of the three-year State teachers' contract will also be complicated by the coming elections. Although Signor Moro's Government technically remains in office until the elections, it is doubtful whether it can negotiate the considerable salary increases which the country's 820,000 school workers are now demanding.

And even if it agrees to the teachers' demands, the contract must be later ratified by a Parliament which does not yet exist and which the present caretaker Government does not represent.

An important novelty of the elections will be that two and a half million young people between the ages of 18 and 21 will vote for representatives in the House of Deputies for the first time.

Voting for the Senate, however, is still limited to electors over the age of 25, and this could lead to a situation where the country has a conservative Senate blocking a left-wing House of Deputies.

South Africa

More Africans pass primary level

JOHANNESBURG

The number of African children at school in South Africa went up by 237,000 last year, bringing the total to more than 3.7m. Giving these figures in its annual report, the Department of Bantu Education says this means that one in every five of the total Black population of 17.7m was attending school in 1975.

They were taught by nearly 70,000 teachers at 12,500 schools—an increase of 626 in the number of schools the previous year. The average of 54 pupils per class was still considerably higher than in White schools.

A significant feature of the statistics is the steadily growing number of young Africans who go beyond the primary school. The department points out that 20 years ago fewer than 50,000 scholars had come as far as Standard 5, the entry point to secondary school. In 1975 more than this number had reached Standard 8, leading to matriculation.

Minister promises no spending cuts

SYDNEY

The largest-ever education rally to gather in Canberra last week heard Senator John Carrick, Minister for Education, pledge that the Government would maintain the present level of education funding. Two-and-a-half thousand delegates from every State, representing parents' and teachers' organizations, took part in the rally.

Senator Carrick also promised that the Government would not abolish the Schools Commission. It remained committed, he said, to expanding programmes for the underprivileged, the handicapped and Aboriginals.

Senator Carrick's speech was the firmest denial that the Government has issued so far to contradict persistent rumours that the Budget in August will cut educational spending and that the future of the Schools Commission is in jeopardy.

Mr Gough Whitlam, the Opposition leader, told the rally that the Government was preparing plans for dismantling the education programme initiated by the former Labour administration.

10m go to workers' courses

PARIS

Ten million workers have followed courses and attended classes since the passing of the July 1971 law requiring employers to contribute financially towards continuing professional training programmes, according to M Jean-Pierre Soisson, Secretary of State for Professional Training. The figure of 2.5m for 1974 was double that for 1970, says M Soisson in a report.

The report says that in 1974 manual workers, who form 80 per cent of the working population, benefited from 69 per cent of the training hours provided, while technicians, forming 14 per cent, benefited from 21 per cent of the hours, and engineers and managerial staff, forming 6 per cent, benefited from 10 per cent.

Employers as a whole were making a larger financial contribution that the law requires: in 1974 it was 1.63 per cent of the total wage bill, while the law only required each employer to spend the equivalent of 1 per cent of his wage bill.

The largest part of the State contribution, which in 1975 exceeded 3,000m francs (£300m), has gone to classes for workers who lost their jobs and wished to train for new skills or new jobs.

In 1974 500,000 out of 900,000 attending State-run courses were under the age of 25. Among these were 33,000 under 19—most of them with no certificate and no technical qualifications—who took six to eight-month courses during which they received £40 a month plus free lodging when the training centre was far from their home. This special programme, originally launched for one year, is to be continued.

Young people who have not had a job since they left school constitute the priority problem. The Government has adopted a law proposed by M Soisson to be submitted to Parliament which provides that the fund constituted by employers' contributions under the 1971 law can be used to give initial professional training to young people looking for their first job. Until now this fund could only be used for continuing training for those already employed or who had lost a job.

Washington stalls on 'bilingualism'

from Thomas Cahill

NEW YORK

What are the responsibilities of a school to pupils whose primary language is not English? This issue has been quietly heating up for the past few years, especially in urban areas, as consciousness of separate ethnic identities has been on the rise and as America has experienced a new influx of immigrants, many of whom, being Asian, have much greater difficulties of acculturation than immigrants from Europe.

The question has now turned into a major tug-of-war between the Federal Department of Health, Education, and Welfare and the local school districts. If it is ever decided—as it well may be, either in court or by Federal fiat—that every American has the legal right to be taught in his own language, public education would be radically transformed.

For nearly a year now school districts throughout the country have been under the impression that they are obliged to provide comprehensive bilingual education for pupils whose primary language is not English.

For districts with significant numbers of pupils speaking a variety of foreign languages the supposed obligation has become a source of despair. Now, with budgets shrunk by recession and inflation, are they to provide full instruction in history, maths, social studies and so forth, in, say, Spanish, Korean and Tagalog?

A new internal memorandum, quietly issued by HEW now makes it appear that the school systems are not quite so obliged as they thought—at least for the moment.

In 1974 the Supreme Court ruled in the Lau v Nichols case that the plaintiffs—pupils of Chinese ancestry who spoke Chinese at home and whose scholastic progress was hampered by their limited ability to understand English—had the right to special consideration by the San Francisco schools they attended.

The court, however, though it enumerated various forms of compensatory instruction, did not mandate a specific remedy. In fact, San Francisco has yet to initiate a special programme for children of Chinese ancestry.

Advocates of bilingual education within HEW, however, used the Supreme Court decision as an opportunity for strengthening their own position.

They issued a document that has become known as the "Lau Remedies", calculated to give the impression that fully-fledged bilingual programmes were mandatory wherever there were pupils whose ability in English was limited and that school systems that failed to comply risked the loss of Federal funds.

In recent years school systems have generally met the problem of foreign-language children—if they have met it at all—with English as Second Language (ESL) programmes. That is, the children have been taught English by special methods developed to assist them in making the transition from their first language to English. After that, the children have been expected to continue their education in the usual classes taught in English.

Minority groups: what are their rights if they want to be taught in their mother tongue?

The "Lau Remedies" specifically declare that ESL "is not appropriate" as a solution to pupils' language difficulties.

Regional HEW personnel then began to enforce the new directives. School officials in Seattle, Washington, for instance, were told last September by the regional HEW director that they were "required" to provide full bilingual programmes for 1,212 children of Spanish, German, Chinese, Korean, Japanese and Filipino ancestry — an elaborate, expensive, and perhaps impossible task.

Now the Office of Civil Rights of HEW has been forced to issue a "clarification". The "Lau Remedies", it turns out, were "guidelines only" and "not exclusive".

Given the bias at HEW in favour of bilingual programmes, the school districts are still left in a quandary. They must be able to prove that their ESL programmes provide foreign language pupils with equal access to education—a civil right. They must, in effect, be able to demonstrate that those pupils do not fall behind if they do not receive all their instruction in their primary language.

The issue will probably take years to resolve. Recently a Denver court threw out a suit brought by Spanish-speaking Americans who complained that the lack of bilingual and bicultural programmes in Denver constituted a violation of their civil rights. The court found that there was no general agreement among education experts on this subject.

In fact, disagreement was so widespread that, by contrast, it made psychiatrists—who so often contradict one another in giving evidence—appear "almost of a single mind", according to the court.

Bursaries and Awards to Artists 1976–77

Professional artists (painters, sculptors, printmakers) are invited to apply for four Bursaries of £3,500 and a number of Awards of up to £1,500 being offered by the Arts Council of Great Britain this year. Bursary applications will be considered in July, 1976, with a closing date of June 4. Awards applications will be considered twice yearly in July, 1976, and January, 1977, with closing dates of June 4 and November 26, 1976, respectively.

Further details and application forms obtainable from: The Assistant Art Director, Dept TES, Arts Council of Great Britain, 105 Piccadilly, London W1V 0AU. Tel.: 01-629 9495.

Awards to Photographers 1976–77

Awards are available to individual photographers or groups of photographers who wish to pursue a specific project for a limited period of time. The value of an Award may be any sum up to £2,500 and will depend on the applicant's estimates of costs. Application for Awards will be accepted at any time during the year but processing may take up to two months.

Further details and application forms obtainable from: Barry Lane, Dept TES, Photography Officer, Arts Council of Great Britain, 105 Piccadilly, London W1V 0AU. Tel.: 01-629 9495.

What price the language assistant

Sir,— I have been asked to draw attention to the diseconomy of the cuts being made by a number of local education authorities in their employment of foreign language assistants.

The assistant scheme was set up in 1905 and has long been the largest of student and young teacher training schemes, with more than 8,000 appointments made annually. More than 4,000 of these have been in Britain in recent years, because heads of modern language departments—many of them ex-assistants and fully aware of the benefits of the scheme—have urged their heads of school and L.e.a.s to add this lively dimension to their teaching of languages.

The cost is low, little more than £1,000 a year an assistant. Our pupils and students meet and learn from native speakers of modern languages they are studying. Our language teachers gain an up-to-date point of reference and support. An international element is introduced into classrooms and staffrooms and integrated into the teaching programmes.

Most foreign assistants go on to become teachers of English in their own countries. The rest take their knowledge of Britain and English into other careers. The scheme is of great educational and political value, the more so now it brings young people from over 40 countries and three continents to Britain for a year.

It is essentially a cooperative scheme, as befits the Central Bureau's function, and has an element of "aid" in it. Thousands of young people are now queueing in many countries, advanced and developing, to pay their fares here and work hard as an assistant. There is no scheme like it for two-way value.

Yet some L.e.a.s are cutting down on assistant posts, undoubtedly thinking they will save money by so doing. The fact is that in the measure Britain makes cuts, we can expect other countries to cut down on British assistant posts. Germany has just cut by 18 per cent.

The year abroad is obligatory for many British students of languages. So those for whom we cannot find assistant posts will have to go abroad anyway, and attend university. They will then go on the state grant to which they are entitled. This they will need to top up with about £500 of their own money. The cost will therefore be several hundred pounds more than the cost of employing a foreign assistant here.

The British school and teacher training systems will be denied a valuable resource. British students will be denied an opportunity their professors have carefully chosen for them. This new situation, which educationists generally will deplore, will actually cost Britain a great deal more than the present one.

What has obscured this, is the fact that grants for study abroad come out of pooled expenditure, whereas the cost of foreign assistants falls directly on L.e.a. budgets.

The Department of Education and Science have said they hope local authorities will consider the implications of cuts proposed in this important scheme. Parents, teachers, governors, students and pupils can well understand and accept reasonable cuts when they save money for more useful investment. To pay much more for a much inferior service, is a choice they will all find unacceptable. The main implications of the cuts are a lowering of standards in modern language teaching, and in teacher training, coupled with a steep increase in costs.

L.e.a. budgets are surely not so far removed from pooled expenditure that the initial savings at local level can not be seen to be linked to the eventual and greater cost which in due course will have to be met at the same local level. It is hoped the L.e.a.s in question will now review their position, and help preserve a scheme of unique value to learners and teachers of modern languages.

JAMES PLATT,
Director,
Central Bureau for Education Visits and Exchanges.

Black crusading apostles

Sir,—For fear that readers may get the wrong impression that members of the minority groups use the National Association for Teachers of English conference as a bandwagon to let off hot air about all their ills in society: under-privilege, cultural deprivation, dialect, underachievers among blacks and so demand for more black teachers in responsible positions in our schools, let me as a black teacher unequivocally state that we regard the forum of conference to be much more than simply that. We see ourselves as apostles on a most serious crusade representing the views of all the thousands of blacks in our school system who unfortunately lack the tenacity and energy to attend such a conference as this. Bearing this in mind we are faced with a dual responsibility.

Minority groups use the forum of a conference for two purposes: to learn and to teach, and it is in the former that a conference wins our highest esteem. I recollect a delegate saying to me quietly over a cup of coffee: "NATE has not changed over the 15 years that I have been attending it and will never do—it remains purely a body through which influence can be exerted rather than one for making public pronouncements and issuing directives and public statements of educational policy." It may not be a panacea but I have observed enormous public pressure making for social change."

Bearing that in mind therefore, we set about marshalling our forces for reasoned arguments wherever possible. I lost no time debating into the small hours of the morning with colleagues the deep psychological feeling that is felt by the immigrant child he teaches and whose culture he must attempt to understand and appreciate if effective education is to take place. Scholarly or academic culture is a common code enabling all those possessing that code to attach the same meaning to the same words, the same type of behaviour and the same works; and conversely to express the same meaning through the same words, the same behaviour patterns and the same works. The school, which is responsible for handing on the culture, is the fundamental factor in the cultural consensus as it represents the sharing of common sense which is the prerequisite for communication.

Academic debate aside, it is impossible to measure the immense benefit gained through social interaction and common purpose in leisure pursuits away from the turmoil of the classroom. It is for this reason that I hope to see more members of the ethnic minority playing a full part at NATE conference in the future.

Up a creek in Brent

Sir,—I was shocked to read David Holbrook's letter (April 23) in which he claims that the true cost of his lecture for the London Borough of Brent was £100. Far be it from me to say his costing is up the creek, or to speak for Brent, with which I have no connection.

But has Mr Holbrook got his priorities right? Does he not realise that unless he fills out a part-time teachers' application form, he does not exist, and could not claim compensation if his students savaged him. Neither could he be prosecuted if, better still, he were to savage his students?

More important, should he become less disillusioned and become a full-time teacher, somebody must have written evidence of his part-time lecturing hours so that he may be given full incremental credit for part service. If the exact sum of money paid to him and his fellows were not similarly recorded and broken down into fees and expenses, it would not be possible to make an accurate percentage cut under these heads in a future year should the government or l.e.a. decree such a cut.

Computers or no, the cost of such mathematical manipulations to many local authorities would be nil, for they would be done by the appropriate head of department, who would simultaneously be interviewing two prospective students, berating an existing one, finding a replacement for a technical drawing tutor afflicted with tennis elbow, dictating three UCCA references, taking a telephone call from a parent reporting that her daughter had gone berserk, completing four statistical returns for the DES and fending off the county architect waiting outside to tell him that he would have to make other arrangements for the RSA examinations due that afternoon as the typing rooms had suddenly developed an attack of "high alumina".

Embarrassed and shocked

Sir,—On reading O. R. Johnston's letter (April 23), I was horrified to think of children aged eight to 10 being shown a film sequence of the birth of a baby. Most children of this age are not asking questions which need such explicit answers.

A few may be but the Merry go Round : Sex Education programmes are intended for use with whole classes from which an individual may not easily escape if feeling revulsion at the sight of the bloody baby. I agree with Mr Johnston: many children will be embarrassed and disturbed; also shocked.

When head of a junior and infant school I always found adequate for the eight to 10 age group, the drawings and simpler explanations given in Where Do Babies Come From? Being a radiovision programme, it could be shown to parents who could then approve or disapprove, but heads are going to find it nigh impossible to allow parents to express any opinion between viewing the programme for themselves on May 4 and their children seeing it on May 7. So I assume parents' consent will not be sought.

Even teachers will find it difficult in such a short time to discuss and evaluate the possible effects of showing the material. This is an altogether unsatisfactory situation.

RENA FISHER,
Headmistress,
Nursery Hill First School,
Ansley Common,

Pilate's handwashing

Sir,—Prior consultation of parents, by letter, as suggested by Mr Johnston has been tried before. It proves to be a Pilate's handwashing, relieving the teachers without saving the children.

Parents fail to reply, for some, today, are only semi-literate anyway, some principal letter-writers, the mothers, are now workers with no time, some recognize the letter for what it may well be, a formality that precedes an inevitable showing of a programme a many fear to say "No" lest their children be victimised by classmates or staff: and sometimes letters arrive after the showing.

From my experience, failure to reply, silence, in this instance, is dissent, sometimes accompanied by despair. For parents sense what professional observations reveal, that sex programmes, such as Merry Go Round should never be seen by children. This new version (judging from the teacher's notes) will certainly prove more damaging than the earlier edition, although, as with the latter, the full effect of the derangement of moral, emotional and sexual integration and maturation they may induce will not be manifest until after the child has passed out of the programme's class.

Two things should be borne in mind when considering these programmes. Never, except for the professionally trained adult (and in certain, abnormal, circumstances pertaining to royalty) has any but the parous woman been let in on parturition: the harm it could do to people who have not experienced for themselves the ultimate "victory" that washes out the ordeal, has been understood intuitively throughout all ages and in all places.

The second factor is related to the first. Maturation is not just a matter of growth and knowledge. It is a metamorphosis, involving total changes in constitution, rhythms, attitudes and behaviour patterns, more marked, and with one stage extra in the female. The fulfilment of each stage is dependent upon the intensity of the surprise or shock element that initiated it. This applies particularly to the personal volte-face at the first parturition, when the self-preservation instinct is replaced by the self-sacrificing or maternal instinct, a joyful enablement for the new mother in her role.

Foreknowledge and even more, the vicarious experiences afforded by such programmes as Merry Go Round, eliminates surprise: so the damage done, especially to the pre-pubertal girl, can have far-reaching effects that are the very opposite of what the caring educators intended when they devised this form of preparation for adulthood.

As one who is no educator, but who meets, privately and professionally, the effects of education, may I be permitted to remind teachers that omission is always a lesser evil than commission: and Merry Go Round is no exception to this rule.

Threat to common exam

Sir,—The arguments for and against a common exam system have become so polarized that there is a danger that the whole scheme will be scrapped and nothing achieved. The result of this will be that schools will continue to mould the existing system to their needs piecemeal. Matters would be greatly helped if some central agency could give examinations a nudge in the direction desired by the schools.

The greatest weakness of the present system is the need to prepare pupils for different exams within the same classroom. This arises through the widespread elimination of banding into O level, CSE and non-exam groups, in favour of a much more flexible system of choices. The freer the choice of subjects, the greater the possibility of mixed ability groups where O level is within the capabilities of some, but not of all. In these cases, what is needed is a common exam system rather than common exam.

There seems to be agreement that what is feasible, is not necessarily practical as far as the common exam at 16 plus is concerned. There is a strong feeling that a common exam would be possible but not desirable in mathematics, science subjects and languages. The concepts and words used to examine the most able, would be incomprehensible to those of more modest ability. The feared result would be that the exam will be pitched too low so that all can at least understand the questions.

The conclusion of a working party at the Littlehampton School was that there should be a two-tier common examination system. The first tier should be substantially controlled by the teachers and should examine up to the present grade two of CSE. This would retain all the virtues of the present CSE, with the possibilities of various levels of teacher control, depending on the policies of individual schools and departments within those schools. Any pupils wishing to improve on grade two CSE would be required to sit an external national examination, which would be externally set and marked. This would meet the demand from universities and professional bodies for standard qualifications and for schools for an examination system which really did stretch the most able.

All that is needed to implement these changes is for the CSE boards and the O level boards to cooperate on standardising syllabuses so that there is a common system of examinations. If the Schools Council and the Government fail to agree on a common examination system, schools will continue to make progress in that direction themselves. What might happen in the meantime is that the examination boards, in their efforts to win the battle for control of the common examination, will lose their present distinction and usefulness, by attempting to incorporate the merits of their rivals.

There are already signs of O level boards offering Mode 3 systems of examining and CSE boards instituting a system of external marking. The best solution would seem to be to institutionalise the present differences between the CSE and O level boards in a common two-tier system of examining.

MICHAEL D. PALMER,
Deputy head,
The Littlehampton School,
Littlehampton, Sussex.

Working for the devil

Sir,—Can the Director of the National Festival of Light remember when he was eight to nine years of age? I can remember at least as far back as 1930 when I was a small boy who was disgusted to learn that a young couple, friends of my parents, were expecting their first child. I realized that they must have behaved as animals.

My sex education had consisted of various admonitions from my parents, some smutty talk from boys a few years older than myself, and observation of animals copulating. In a word, I was the victim of that obscurantism and false idealism which Mr Johnston and the Festival of Light appear to be eager to promote. To withhold knowledge is not the proper way to ensure happiness, and to close a source of knowledge because it may be a source of offence is doing the devil's work for him.

I am inclined to agree that the classroom is not the ideal place for sex education, since children's readiness for it varies from one individual to another, but a well-conducted lesson is infinitely better than peer-group tuition or the commercial exploitation of children's natural curiosity. There are not an infinite number of alternative sources of accurate information, and parents, who should be the ideal source, are not, because many of them have insufficient knowledge, an inadequate vocabulary, or guilty feelings which prevent emotional neutrality.

The attempt to suppress Inside Linda Lovelace cost the tax-payers some £36,000 which could have bought enough library copies of suitable books that would have saved Mr Johnston's blushes. The moral is that a negative approach is expensive and, ultimately, ineffective.

MARK A. BLOOMFIELD,

BBC confidence in teachers

Sir,—By now many parents and teachers will have taken the opportunity to see the first of the remade programmes in the Merry Go Round sex series.

They will have compared what they saw and heard with what Mr O. R. Johnston chose to write in the TES on April 23, making selective use of extracts from the teachers' notes that accompany the series. They may also have read what your reviewer had to say about them in your issue of April 30.

First, in terms of providing teachers and parents with the opportunity to pre-view the programmes the BBC regrets that more film copies of the programmes were not available for sale or hire at a much earlier date than proved possible. It would have been better if they had been.

However, the BBC educational departments have a good deal more confidence in the ability of teachers to make judgments about suitability of material than Mr Johnston appears to have. Teachers and parents can now see the programmes on air. Copies of the programmes will become increasingly available for such viewing as teachers and parents may wish. This resource material will then be available to those who wish to use it over the next few years.

I am content to have our standards of responsibility in this matter judged on the quality of the programmes and their educational value, intended parents and teachers should see these programmes and teachers should see the accompanying notes. Then they will be able to judge whether Mr Johnson's charge that we have assaulted the emotions of children is a justified one.

DONALD GRATTAN
Controller,
Educational Broadcasting, BBC.

Symbolic language of mathematics

Sir,—Mr Flemming in "Modelling and Creativity in Mathematics" (April 23) points out that "The concern of mathematical education is surely that the pupil shall progressively learn the language".

It is often mistakenly assumed that mathematics is nothing more than "another language" and this is about as true as saying that the words in which we describe an event —a description of a holiday or a horse-race commentary, for instance —comprise the actual happening itself.

The words do no more than evoke the happening; and so it is with the symbolic language of mathematics. The symbols recall to the mathematician whatever it is that the symbols symbolize.

TEACHERS' ASSURANCE

TEACHERS' ARE ON GOOD TERMS WITH TEACHERS

informal? Statistically valid or flawed? Neville Bennett's book, published last week, has produced strong reactions from fans and sceptics.

According to the evidence

Sir,—There are further important comments to be made about Neville Bennett's book.

First, I would like to emphasize the point made by Rogers and Barron concerning Bennett's failure to control for factors such as teacher experience and social class. Bennett gives the impression that by adjusting post-test scores for initial differences he has moved from simply observing associations between attainment and teaching style towards describing a causal relationship between them.

This, however, is not so. All he has done is to study the association between teaching styles and children's progress as opposed to their attainment at a particular point in time. Calling such an approach "quasi-experimental" simply obscures this fact. Indeed, one would expect that if teaching styles were associated with attainment at a given age they would also be associated with changes in attainment before and after that age.

Second, there are some specific technical criticisms of the analyses actually carried out. It is a little difficult to make precise criticisms here since precious little technical detail is given, consisting of a short summary in appendix C. His "residual degrees of freedom", however, are wrong (they should be 946 with a sample of 950, not 947), and his separate "sums of squares" add up exactly to the total sum of squares, which is rather odd and makes one wonder just how they have been calculated and precisely what is being tested.

The particular analysis he had carried out also makes no allowance for variation between teachers within each teaching style, although it is clear that this variation is not trivial. Had this been incorporated into the analysis a great deal more information could have been extracted.

Bennett also seems to be somewhat confused about the role of unreliability of test scores. On page 81 he gives as a reason for not carrying out an analysis of raw gain scores the combined unreliability associated with such scores. What he ignores is the fact that the presence of unreliability can seriously distort the results of a covariance analysis. If the unreliability is high enough it can even have the effect of reversing what are the true differences. In the present case it is difficult to say just what the result of applying an appropriate correction would be.

After discussing average differences between teaching styles, Bennett goes on to examine differences according to initial attainment levels. He claims, for example, that among the boys with the lowest attainment the formally taught show less progress. Unfortunately, this and similar claims tend to be based on small numbers of children and there is no attempt to carry out proper statistical tests.

Third, Bennett's research design seems to be remarkably inefficient. Interesting as the results of his cluster analysis are, this surely does not provide an appropriate framework within which to study the effect of teaching methods. The problem is that any differences found are those between types of teacher as defined by clusters of attributes. What cannot be assessed directly are the separate components of the different styles which account for these differences.

Admittedly, Bennett does discuss the reasons for the differences, but had he set up a properly structured design in the first place which allowed the effects of the different components to be analysed, he could have had his original cluster analysis and said something more useful about the detailed components of each teaching style.

Finally, I would like to say that I don't consider such criticisms as these to be mere nit picking as Shipman implies but rather fundamental queries about the validity of the study and the weight which we can attach to its conclusions. While it is possible that the conclusions themselves are correct, my own view is that the present evidence is not sufficient to justify them.

HARVEY GOLDSTEIN,
Statistician,
National Children's Bureau.

Insights not indoctrination

Sir,—A colleague has just drawn my attention to a remark by Noel Entwistle made in his foreword to Neville Bennett's book Teaching Styles and Pupil Progress in which Professor Entwistle says, "Three of the team went as mature students to a single college of education, Chorley College, which has a strong reputation for instilling child-centred attitudes".

I was a major education tutor for all three during their time at the college and had it been my intention to "instil" such attitudes into my students I could be accounted a failure. But this was never my objective. Rather I endeavoured to provide them with the best available insights into educational theory and practice while demanding that they preserved critical, yet open minds on such matters.

It must however be said that Dr Bennett and Mrs Jordan were, during their teaching practice periods, truly "child-centred" i.e. deeply concerned with the cognitive, affective and social growth of all the children under their charge.

It is my sincere hope that they arrived at the teaching methods they then adopted as a result of serious reflection and not as a consequence of any indoctrination by myself and my colleagues and am aware that one of the team who has taken a post as a school teacher continues in this way.

Could try harder . . .

Sir,—Bennett has shown that formal teaching is the best preparation for formal testing, and that teachers who follow fashion and change to informal methods without also changing their aims will not do better. The aim is 100 per cent literacy; but if everybody can read and nobody does, is it worth while?

Children, like other inert bodies, will go further if they are pushed. But informal education is concerned about what happens when the pushing stops. Anxiety? . . . is not anxiety a proper response to the world as it is, let alone the world as it will be if the educationists do not put their tape-measures and their sit-combs away and shoulder their proper responsibility for making the future world a bit nearer what it ought to be?

What really goes on in class?

Neville Bennett's study has raised the question of whether formal teaching makes for greater progress in reading than more informal methods. This was one of the key questions in my recent research at Sussex University into teacher decision making and reading progress.

My analysis of earlier published research evidence led me to conclude that it might. But the cost of that progress seemed to be heavy. Indeed, I had earlier concluded that a month or two of reading age (and probably much less than that) seemed a small price to pay for a little humanity.

At the same time, even if more formal teachers did produce greater gains, we knew remarkably little about what they actually did in their classrooms to bring this about. It seemed unlikely that their success resulted merely from being more formal.

During two years of fieldwork I collected complete and reliable pre-test and post-test data (from Christmas to July) using the Young Group Reading Test for about 1,800 top infant children (six and seven-year-olds). They were taught by 41 teachers in 21 schools, chosen by a random sampling procedure from working and lower working class areas in two outer London boroughs.

The research was first carried out in 1972-73 and, to confirm the findings, it was repeated in the following year with the same teachers but the next cohort of children.

I chose top infants, first because it is generally recognised as the "crunch" stage for teaching reading. As one teacher said: "It's all right if you can't read when you're six, but God help you when you're 7½!" Second, I wanted to be sure that the teachers shared a major teaching objective. Third, I wanted to avoid contaminating my research with external factors such as teaching for tests like the 11-plus. I supplemented this by extensive discussion with and classroom observation of the teachers involved.

My chief concern was to understand how they thought and analysed their own teaching behaviour and to try to link these individual perspectives. For example, did they recognise the existence of terms like "formal" and "informal"? Was this the main distinguishing feature of their approach? If it was, did it, of necessity, demand other compromises.

Like the Ford Teaching Project at the University of East Anglia, I saw part of my role as a researcher in terms of "negotiating" a set of common terms to describe teachers across the sample. There seemed little point in generating terms to describe the teaching of reading which teachers themselves did not share.

Interviews with heads and teachers formed the basis from which I built up a picture of each teacher's approach. A distinct impression at this early stage was that teachers whom I was inclined to regard as formal seemed to be much better able to describe what they did than those who were apparently informal. This seemed to result in part from the way in which they initially responded to the question: "How do you teach reading?" They seemed to be describing a set of fairly narrow reading skills related to word recognition and progress through reading schemes.

Teachers who, at this stage, seemed more informally oriented, had greater difficulty in explaining what they did. They would frequently end the discussion with apologies for being incoherent and unhelpful. Later, when I had seen for myself what they were doing, they presented their teaching approaches with much greater confidence.

The apparent lack of early confidence was confirmed when I found that more informal teachers were less likely to recommend their own approaches to the teaching of reading, or assess their own ability as highly as more formal teachers. Teachers who were recommended by their own heads as embodying "good practice", or who were themselves reading specialists, tended to emphasize more formal approaches.

By the end of my fieldwork I found that just under 60 per cent of the teachers in my sample adopted, and agreed they adopted, an "informal" or "quite informal" approach. This almost certainly reflects the widespread use of more informal approaches at the lower end of the primary school, but as children get older and teaching becomes more subject-centred, more formal teaching approaches begin to dominate.

More formal teachers differ in their approach from the more informal, first, by placing much more emphasis on reading both in discussion and in classroom practice. They tend to say things like: "I have a bee in my bonnet about reading", and "Reading is the important thing a child can learn". In their teaching they are more likely to . . . if you ask children in informal classrooms what they are reading they usually reply in terms of the book they are on in the reading scheme.

There is also usually a limited range of games and materials in their classrooms, and they rarely conduct regular sessions of direct instruction in phonics. In formal their classrooms are focused on the development of a narrow range of reading skills. They do not, however, appear to hear more children read individually.

Other factors related to . . . formal teaching are worth noting. The few streamed classes I taught at this level. The children were from a higher socio-economic group, and were more likely to do well in any case. Formal teachers were also older, more experienced, had more infant school experience and had been at the school longer.

Last week I reran my own data on the Edinburgh computer, and was able to anticipate many of the criticisms made in Vincent Rogers's methodological critique of Neville Bennett's findings since I had been following the methods of American researchers.

In the first year classes of children taught by formal teachers made an average of just under one standardized point more reading progress than did those taught by informal teachers. (An individual standard deviation was 12 standardized points.) In the second year, with the same teachers but with a different cohort of children, the difference was just over one standard point. The manual for the Young Group Reading Test indicates that this difference amounts to about one month of reading age. The neither year, however, were the differences large enough to be statistically significant.

In brief, my research suggests that there is no reason to suppose that formal teaching is significantly associated with greater reading progress. Of course, neither this conclusion nor my results relating the prevalence of informal teaching in my sample can be generalized on a national basis to other types or other age groups.

The space between the words

Watching Horizon (April 26) on the Lancaster study was more enlightening in some ways than verbal reports of the study itself. It helped to answer the question of whether the study is fish or fowl. Frankly in the opening scenes of what turned out to be the progressive school, I was for a few seconds a little disorientated.

Just how was the progressive school radically different? There was mathematics done outside, using playground squares as coordinates, but who was running things? Was there free questioning among the children of each other? I did not see it. There was an afternoon's free choice of activities, so described by the commentator—choose from sewing, cooking and two others; only in school reality (or, I suppose, political speeches) could this be free choice.

But what you really got from the film, which you can never get from the pages of a report, is the sights and sounds of informal transactions, the tone of voice, and quality of looks. This showed beyond doubt that in progressive as in traditional settings it was the teacher who was the focus: you could hear that special brand of language, teacher-talk; you could see the children in the traditional school-induced power-relationship, teacher defining the parameters of reality, and in particular what counted as knowledge.

I do not mean in the realm of evaluation alone; this was clearest in the creative poetry session, which began with the stimulus (a significant term?) of a bowl of wriggling something. First statement by the teacher: "Do not ask me what they are, I want your feelings/reactions." But I wanted to ask what they were, I still do; it bothers me tremendously to be asked to write creatively when I have something like that on my mind. But I would have known better than to be bothered in school. There does not have to be any confrontation about it; I am a human being, I pick up the subliminal clues.

Creative writing became not a self-directed, meaningful activity, but a performance directed to the teacher, in which each strove to outdo the others in what degenerated into rococo, twee and arresting (for the teacher's benefit) metaphor.

What was different in the schools was the degree of humaneness apparent at the overt level. What was the same, however, was the teacher-centred nature of the learning, which itself varied only by its degree of overtness. So, we can argue, this study is not a comparison of fundamentally different styles of learning. There is essentially one system at work with what are, in terms of learning, cosmetic or peripheral differences (ie, the humanized teacher-centred mode versus the uncompromisingly teacher-centred).

According to the study only 9 per cent really, and only 17 per cent at most of teachers are teaching in the progressive way. This suggests that the professional opinion of teachers is that the teacher needs control, the power to define the educational situation. Therefore most do not move towards a style that lessens the apparent degree of control—though they do vary the formality of their approach. Second, children grow up in this culture with a general concept of what school-teaching is like and what roles are expected within that situation.

Unless something out of the ordinary about the child's whole schooling context, or about its upbringing or its own perceptiveness intervenes, it will tend to make sense of school in terms of the traditional categories. Any move towards liberalization runs the risk of being interpreted in terms of the traditional adversary relationship, which for many children must mean that it is legitimate and incumbent upon them to test apparent freedom to the limits.

However, in educational as the study is not all that profound in the present political climate is the most serious educational but because it strikes at a central educational concern, everyone's children. The tragedy is that this study will be tacitly treated as the basis for future debate. The Times already, in its leader of April 26, calls the study a starting-point for any future revolution of the real problems of education, because it has a basis in fact not opinion. So back we go to the futility game, all the fancy stats and proofs of validity in the world avail a man nothing if he puts rubbish into the computer.

Instead we should be looking for genuine alternatives in learning like the Lancaster study we have a perfect prescription for carrying on believing that normality is good enough, and we do not need to look beyond it. It is not a study of alternative modes of learning, but of alternative modes of teacher-centred pedagogy, the overt and covert.

Because these modes of teaching are compared by measuring children's learning, it is implied, and in many quarters concluded, that there are in fact finding out about alternative ways of learning. We will be doing so until we begin by identifying, and then researching, genuine alternative paradigms of learning. We will not get there by starting out looking at teaching in conventional schools, even though that is where we must end up.

Seeking and finding alternatives

Nicolas Walter criticises the privileged position of religion in schools, and describes some proposals for reform

Throughout the century of state education in Britain, it has been generally agreed that outside bodies should have no place in the system, with one exception—the churches. During the thirty years of the present system, it has been generally agreed that there should be impartial treatment of all subjects, again with one exception—religion. Education is, in fact, one of the few remaining areas of our society where the Christian religion still has a privileged position.

To begin with, church schools (or so-called "voluntary" schools) still include about one-third of the schools maintained by public money, and about one-fifth of the children educated at public expense. Most church schools are Anglican or Roman Catholic, but some are Nonconformist or Jewish, and a few may soon be Muslim or Hindu. In some places, especially in rural areas, they are the only available schools. They are run to a greater or lesser extent—depending on whether they are "aided" or "controlled"—by religious bodies which contribute virtually nothing to their cost.

These schools exist for purely historical reasons; when the state began its own schools in 1870 it decided to support the existing church schools rather than take them over, and the resulting "dual system" has been retained and even reinforced ever since. These schools survive for purely political reasons; no government has dared to offend religious lobbies by interfering with them. But they have no educational, administrative, or any other justification, and are an anachronistic anomaly—and also a divisive force in society.

An equally anachronistic anomaly is the special position of religion in the state schools (or so-called "county" schools), which are entirely financed by public money and controlled by public authorities. The 1944 Education Act imposed a statutory compulsion on both church and state schools to provide a daily "act of worship" and an unspecified amount of "religious instruction". In state schools the worship and instruction must not be "distinctive of any particular religious denomination", but they are clearly intended to be Christian. The instruction must be given according to Agreed Syllabuses drawn up by local authorities in consultation with local religious leaders, and the syllabuses and the lessons which follow them represent the lowest common denominator of Christian doctrine.

Although religion is legally compulsory, because it is the only subject which schools must offer, it is also legally voluntary, because it is the only subject which parents and teachers may contract out of. The 1944 Act contains conscience clauses which in theory give parents the right to withdraw their children, and teachers the right to withdraw themselves from religious worship and/or instruction. But most parents and many teachers, even when they know their rights, are not prepared to risk the consequences of insisting on them, and for children religion is in practice virtually compulsory.

Religious worship and religious instruction have changed during the past thirty years. The former has tended to become a neutral "assembly", and the latter has tended to become vague "religious education"; they are often scarcely religious and some schools, especially in urban areas, have no religious activity at all. But the 1944 Act has not changed, and as these activities become less explicitly religious and more genuinely educational, they become more obviously illegal. Any further improvement, whether by progressive Christians or moderate humanists or a combination of the two, can now be prevented by appeals to the law. Any change in the present system must, therefore, involve a change in the law, which means formalizing proposals for reform.

There have been objections to religion in state schools for as long as there have been state schools. The labour movement eventually gave up the struggle for secular education because of its religious membership, though most of the political opposition to the present system still comes from the left. The humanist movement has kept up the struggle, and feels that it is at last worth calling for radical reform. The proposals of the main humanist organizations—the British Humanist Association, the Rationalist Press Association, and the National Secular Society—may be summed up as follows.

* Church schools should be abolished, and transformed into either independent, schools or state schools. If they want to be controlled by religious bodies, they should be financed by religious bodies; if they want to be financed by rates and taxes, they should be controlled by the bodies which represent ratepayers and taxpayers. In either case, it is objectionable for schools to be supported by the community without being responsible to the community. The proper place for church schools is outside the state system.

* Compulsory acts of worship should be abolished, and replaced by non-religious occasions. If compulsory assemblies are held on school premises in school hours, they should express the corporate nature of the school without introducing devotional exercises. If organized acts of worship are held on school premises, they should be outside school hours and completely voluntary. In either case, it is objectionable for any religious rituals to be forced on children. The proper place for worship is at home or in church, not at school.

* Compulsory religious instruction should be abolished, and replaced by impartial education about both religious and non-religious ideas. If children are taught to believe, that is not education; if they are taught about belief, that is not religion. In either case, it is objectionable to confuse the quite distinct concepts of instruction and education, of faith and reason. The proper place for religious instruction is also at home or in church, not at school.

Most humanists agree about the abolition of the present system of religious education, however much it is improved by conscientious teachers, but they disagree about the details of any future system. Those who belong to the secularist tradition are inclined to absorb general teaching about religion and morality into other lessons, and to postpone specific teaching about religious and non-religious beliefs and values until adolescence. Those who belong to the ethical tradition are inclined to favour formal moral education to replace religious education, and to prefer teaching about religion and irreligion at a rather earlier age. Those who belong to the rationalist tradition are inclined to give religious and moral ideas the same impartial treatment as all other ideas at all ages.

The BHA have recently suggested the concept of education in "stances for living"—a term intended to describe religious and non-religious systems on equal terms. It was introduced into the original 1974 version of the new Birmingham Agreed Syllabus, which included humanism and Marxism alongside traditional religions, but this was rejected on legal grounds and replaced by the revised 1975 version, which included non-religious systems only as subsidiary subjects. The BHA despaired of working within the framework of the 1944 Act, and have made elaborate proposals for a Bill to abolish the compulsory system of religious worship and instruction, and to establish a voluntary system of "education with respect to religious and non-religious outlooks or systems of belief", which, if it were given, would have to be "objective, fair and balanced" (see the BHA pamphlet, Objective, Fair and Balanced).

This approach has been criticized by some other humanist organizations for being too complicated and too concessionary to the present system. The NSS advocates the simple repeal of the relevant sections of the 1944 Act and the development of a new system of negotiation between the educational authorities and the schools while the RPA opposes any protection of either religious or non-religious ideas from critical comment. It has also been criticized by some religious organizations for being too hostile to the present system, and even politically subversive; thus the National Viewers' and Listeners' Association, the Festival of Light and the Order of Christian Unity have launched a campaign to "Save Religious Education", with the warning that only Christian worship and instruction in schools can protect us from immorality and revolution. Other religious organizations have raised more moderate but equally conservative objections; yet many Christians are unhappy enough about the present system to welcome constructive changes, and of course many teachers, parents and children, and several MPs, are not Christian at all.

Most humanists feel that the first task is not to make a choice between the many possible alternatives to the present system, but to make the decision that a genuine alternative must be worked out after proper discussion between all the interested parties. Any such discussion must recognize that the 1944 settlement is now obsolete. Britain is no longer a Christian country but a pluralist society, with not only a multi-racial but also a multi-credal population, in which more and more people follow non-Christian religions or no religion at all. The educational system has already taken account of these changes, being humanist in its attitude to the humanities, rationalist in its attitude to the sciences, and secular in its attitude to the world we all live in. Traditional Christianity survives in schools largely because religious worship and instruction are protected by law and are preserved by the powerful religious establishment in schools, colleges and universities.

The fundamental humanist argument is that religion should not have a privileged position in education, and that schools should not be biased towards Christianity or any other ideology—including humanism. It is sometimes argued that religious education is an essential element in moral education; but we believe that morality does not depend on teaching children religion, and does depend on telling them the truth. On the other hand, it is sometimes argued that religious education is so bad for religion that we should welcome it; but we take both religion and education seriously, and want the former to have a proper place in the latter.

The fundamental humanist aim is not to exclude religion from schools but to extend the religious liberty we have won in society into the educational system; not to deprive children of this part of their heritage, but to let them learn about it freely, openly, and honestly. The real alternative to "religious education" is education.

Making room

Los Angeles' own daredevil : Simon Rodia worked alone for 33 years, building towers 100 feet high in his back yard

Geoffrey Summerfield answers some questions about his forthcoming radio programme 'Daredevils'

Q. Did you choose the topic of daredevils yourself ?

G.S. I did, and it was a very difficult choice to make. Kids of 10 and 11 seem to be interested in everything under—and over—the sun; this means that you have the whole universe and the whole of recorded and unrecorded time to choose from. So I decided to "let something come". I watched kids both at close quarters and at a distance, in a variety of environments, just to refresh my sense of what makes them tick. Then one day it struck me that to a peculiar degree they spend a lot of their time taking risks.

Q. In the sense of cliffhanging, or tightrope walking on busy railway lines ?

G.S. Yes, and also in less dramatic ways: though, I confess, I used to have a weakness for busy railway lines. In the more obvious, sensational, sense—swinging in trees, climbing around derelict buildings, trespassing, wading across rivers, teetering along the string-course of a canal bridge—the sort of thing that makes adults go white with solicitous panic and terror.

And in the less obvious sense, kids are doing so many things for the first time—there's no familiarity or precedent: think of all the initiations and rites de passage. Many of these are practised in private—in front of the mirror, so to speak—but many of the most crucial involve getting into a new kind or degree of relationship: what some people call "socialization".

Q. Do you see a gradual progression in all this ?

G.S. Not at all. It seems to be very uneven like sporadic energetic explorations, interspersed with periods of quiet, relatively static, withdrawal. And, of course, the whole process is deeply affected by the constraints we impose on them. We don't know much about street games after dark, for example; but presumably a great deal of personal discovery takes place in such games, for working-class kids—I surmise that around 10, 11 and 12, I learnt a great deal about my limits in such circumstances—but we can observe the effect, say, of the transition (the jolt, rather) from junior to secondary school, and we are entitled to conclude that for many kids the effects of this change are lamentable.

At 11-plus, they are forced to regress to a position of low-level subordination ; in the top year of a good junior-school, most kids are astonishingly mature, capable, resourceful, and seriously responsible. Then, as "first years" in the secondary school, they are pushed from pillar to post, confused, deprived of responsibility, reduced to dwarf status.

Developmentally, this is crazy : as compensation or balance, then, their curriculum must find generous elbow-room for fantasy. When I was teaching English at Churchfields, West Bromwich, I was constantly struck by the intensity with which the first and second years snatched at every opportunity to work inside fantasy : even those whose predispositions were otherwise for the kind of realism offered by the sciences.

Q. But we all have to live "in the world", don't we ?

G.S. Yes, in one sense, of course we do. But we also create our worlds, both in terms of perception and in terms of acting out those parts that we want need to know better. But in gener don't think we are anywhere near t ing, let alone acting on, a full enough ception of humanness, of human pos lity.

Q. Do you see risk-taking as an impo part of being human ?

G.S. Yes, I do. And if a culture do in some way allow for it and endor then one of the consequences is mala ive behaviour. An exotic, even bla case is the snake-handling cult of southern states of America. He would point to the cults of pseudo-his pseudo-science, crazy cosmologies emy, astrology, and of the myths of pomorphic animals. The popularit Däniken, Wheatley, Richard Adams Alan Garner seems to me symptoma a mild crisis—the "world" of our grinds is flat and stale, without life capacity to animate : hence the search more glamorous, more intensely cha more significant alternatives.

Q. What, then, of the morality of taking ? Especially in its more ext forms ?

G.S. This is central to any considera of fantasy, and involves the status the power of what Jung called Shadow", of what in American cultures takes the form of the "To ster"—those parts of our personality run counter to prevailing orthodox Ted Hughes has offered us some us hints in his comments on his story Iron Man and in his Crow poe analytically, Heuscher in the States given us The Psychoanalytic Study Myth and Fairy Tale ; Jerome Sin or Yale has done some interesting work on "make-believe" (about which he reckons the educational establishment maintain a conspiracy of silence) ; and in France Schuhl and Marc Soriano have done pioneer work. But in England I can't think of any institution or department that is effectively "getting it together". In this respect we are the victims of our insularity ; and we also suffer from the fragmentation of knowledge : the only way to consider "fantasy" is necessarily and unavoidably inter-disciplinary.

Paul Olson did great things in Nebraska when I was there a few years ago : Brian Sutton-Smith, Jerome Bruner, Fanny Schaffel, Kenneth Boulding, together with anthropologists and linguists—a marvellous experience of a variety of disciplines all bringing light to bear, together with "real" people from the community—such as Indians for whom the myths were still true. Not to mention the opportunity to spend timeless hours with John Neihardt, who wrote Black Elk Speaks. But it was all temporary—there was no permanent base ; and of course in England we have nothing like the Munich International Library of Childhood, serving as a research centre. It's symptomatic of our foot-dragging, that the Osborne Collection ended up in Toronto.

Q. What areas of fantasy does your programme touch on?

G.S. I hope that it offers a great variety of options. For example, you can identify with the eighteenth-century scientist conducting an experiment on a bird in an evacuated globe ; or you can identify with the girl who can't "bear the suffering" and so smashes the apparatus. I'd hope that most kids will find both the scientist and the girl inside themselves, with the competing claims of empirical knowledge and of empathy rubbing shoulders.

Q. That sounds like Wright of Derby—"The Experiment with an Air Pump" from the Tate Gallery.

G.S. Exactly. I started with the picture—one of the greatest eighteenth-century English paintings—and tried to get inside the heads of both the scientist and the girl. Historically, it's absolutely central : an image of the Lunar Society and of the scientific origins of the industrial revolution.

Q. Daredevils ?

G.S. Yes, in all sorts of ways. Priestley's house was destroyed by a "mob" because he'd fallen foul of religious orthodoxy ; Erasmus Darwin gives us a very vivid sense of a group of experimentalists continually taking risks : and the boilers of the early steam engines had a habit of blowing up in your face.

Q. Do you see art, as well as science, as a way of taking risks ?

G.S. Yes. A good example is Turner. He not only dared to have himself tied to the mast of a boat so as to see close into the eye of a storm while not being swept overboard, but he also dared to paint what he saw rather than what he knew was there.

And Dürer, who took a piece of turf and gave it the reverence of total attention : one of the great moments in the history of European art. And that's a very modest piece of risk-taking : we can all take something ostensibly ordinary and make it extraordinary by daring to really attend to it. To a spectator such attending can look quite mad.

Q. If we are civilized, then presumably we can "get our kicks" vicariously, and let the cowboys on the screen do our fighting for us ?

G.S. Yes ; that's what Wittgenstein did, in the cinema in Cambridge ; just as he carried Grimm around in his pocket : he'd also taken real risks of course, not only as a philosopher but also as an elementary-school teacher in Austria. But I'm also interested in hierarchies of risk ; for example, the fact that some people get others to take their risks for them : like the sick-joke-statistics about kids sustaining far more serious injuries in PE lessons than when, out of school, taking 'foolish' risks by themselves.

I've given two examples in the programme : one, historic—Sir John Franklin's disastrous trip to the Arctic seas. What is the morality of inducing/persuading/bribing/cajoling other people to take extreme risks ?

The other is contemporary : starting from Paolozzi's marvellous picture, "Zero Energy Electronic Pile", I've written the script for the final briefing of a spaceship crew before blast-off. How much brain-washing do you need to be exposed to before you go on such a mission ? Are the astronauts the heroes of our time, performing actions that realize the dreams that the rest of us dream ? What is a healthy relationship between dream and act ? These are questions that have become peculiarly critical in the past 150 years with increasing urbanization, refinement, and the proliferation of occupations that simply don't answer the full range of any human need.

Q. Such as ?

G.S. An obvious case : I've always been absurdly moved by watching kids who keep pigeons. There's the scrupulous care, the tenderness, the delicacy of ostensibly tough lads. And the way the eyes follow the birds into the skies, in the abandon of flight.

It's a potent image, a metaphor of great resonance—hence, in the past, the power of Kes. I wonder if the policy-makers and social engineers in the higher echelons of the DES ever saw such a sight, ever really teased out its implications ?

Q. Is that a serious question ?

G.S. Perfectly serious : ostensibly weird, but quite serious. Of course, implicitly, it's a root-and-branch question : it's quite likely that we shall soon reach a crisis of alienation that refuses to be solved by merely tinkering with the curriculum, neutral chairman, open-ended discussions, and all the other nostrums. And that larger question is intimately connected with our attitude to kids' "wishes, lies, and dreams" and to their often passionate attachment to particular ways of knowing.

There's no real quarrel between the peculiar excellences of empirical scientific ways of knowing and the distinctive satisfactions of intensely vivid fantasy : they are both manifestations of a capacity for passionate being and doing : but how can our institutions effectively tap, endorse, contain and sustain these ?

Geoffrey Summerfield teaches English at York University, and is currently working on a history of the relationship between fantasy and education, 1760-1860. "Daredevils" will be broadcast next Thursday at 2 pm on Radio 4 VHF in the Radiovision Living Language series.

Out of the prisoning tower

Recollections

Henry Williamson, author of Tarka the Otter, remembers what it was like to be 'the worst boy in the school' some seventy years ago

Nearly all of my generation in Britain when young lived under a fairly strict Victorian discipline. Generally speaking, discipline was imposed at an early age in the nursery and continued more or less rigidly—the cane alone being pliable—through one's schooldays. Not all children lived with the spirit of fear, however ; but it is mainly true to say that many a small boy suffered malformation of the spirit in the first place through chronic fear in his father's home.

If on the other hand there was love within the home, both parents being in balance together, that and not fear was the base on which the child formed its existence, and its future living.

A child lacking love forms itself alone. It will live mainly in a world of fantasy. Francis Thompson, writing his essay on Shelley in the nineties, startled many good people with his revelations of what the child was, something which felt more keenly than even adults. "Thus beset, the child fled into the tower of his own soul, and raised the drawbridge." Had Thompson been born a generation later, he might have added the epithet loveless before "child" ; and that sometimes the loveless child rushes wildly out of its prisoning tower, to steal (fortifying itself with possessions) ; to release tensions by setting fire to dry grassy fields ; to arm itself with a horse-pistol costing ninepence in a junk shop, to load it with black powder and rammed newspaper wads, and thus to advertise, amidst wonderful blue smoke, its own importance.

School was an extension of my "wild boy" (my father's words) fears (my word). But I was not always afraid. Looking back to my boyhood, I realize how fears were often evaded, if their effects are not entirely lost in the elderly man today.

I attended what was originally described as "the Free Grammar School in the Borough", established "of all the best orders and exercises in use at the Free Schooles at Westminster, Paul's and Merchant Taylors' School, and in the Public Free School at Eaton".

The school was at Blackheath. Its founder, in the days of his youth before he created the school partly as an act of penance about 320 years before I arrived there, had badly blotted his copybook by making a speech in favour of the beheaded Earl of Essex, in the hall of Christ Church at Oxford. The speech was reported as sedition to the Lord High Treasurer of England and, his arms bound with cords, the undergraduate was taken to Newgate. But the Lord High Treasurer advised the Queen to show mercy to the youth who, in his later age, as a priest of the parish of Loos'm, as it was still called when I was a boy, devoted himself to good works and the re-establishment of a Free School.

The masters of this establishment, when in due course my nervous self attended there, in a cousin's rough-me-down Eton jacket and trousers and hob-nailed boots, with one exception, were amiable and kind. Among the bigger boys of Lower School there were bullies, who occasionally hunted and sat on me in one or another of the dark lobbies, during the luncheon hour. They held my head underwater while I was learning the breaststroke in the Ladywell Baths, the reason being, I think, that the small thin child with the abnormally large brown eyes gave out an irritating timidity and inability to be as other boys. These roughs, as I thought of them, were escaped from by climbing up a chimney between two buttresses supporting the southern walls of classrooms abutting on the playground. By pressing with plimsolled feet and shoulders alternately, one could get to the top, trembling and suppressing cries, and claw oneself up to an acre or so of roofs and chimney stacks high above the ordinary world.

A sack stuffed into the chimneypot of the headmaster's study caused some bother one winter ; the culprit confessed the instant he saw that his crime was discovered, and received five strokes of the cane, while with eyes shut (as ordered) he was stretched over a chair in order that, as far as was possible, the insulating effect of loose cloth be eliminated.

Canings had an invariable ritual, or dogma, on such occasions. The head was gentleness itself, during this preparatory phase. "Close your eyes; and think." Pause. "I have misbehaved." Pause. "It shall not happen again." Pause. A smut floated down upon one extended hand. Wallop. "Think!" Pause. "It shall happen again." Wallop. "Think! Q. still?" Wallop. "An extra one wriggling, sir. Think now. 'I must get mental power! I must not waste the of others like this again.'" Wallop. "I wriggled again, sir! Quite still, Think! 'I must raise my standard honour.'" Wallop.

I had the whack about a dozen t a term on average, when I was a mem of the Upper School. As an insura against pain, part of an old lead satchel was sewn to the inside seat of knickerbockers. Did the wallops rest somewhat alarmingly loud ? My te flowed the more abundantly, my h expressed despairing contrition, the the stings failed to penetrate my shi At 16 years, to my shame, I still had small body, treble voice and start brown eyeballs, not blue like all prop boys, as my father had told me at thre years of age. His eyes were blue, the headmaster's, mine took after m mother's which easily filled with te like my own, to my father's exasperat and complaint.

What did I learn there, beyond need to be shifty, two-faced, and realization that I was the "worst b in the school", as so often one hea while staring at the carpet in the he master's study ? In the upper fifth were taken by the head himself, for La Euclid, trigonometry and higher mat matics (or the foothills thereof, by w of the binomial theorem, differential culus and projectiles—which very soo afterwards some of us were to experien in practice). I confess that these subject were, without exception, mysteries to m On the margins of Ovid's Metamorphoses and other incomprehensible volumes, made pencil notes of birds and thei eggs, trees, fish and animals around th lakes and trees of the Dowager Countess of Derby's park and lands at Keste where I had permission to roam and where I freed myself of all home and school thoughts. Thither I biked on Wednesday and Saturday afternoons on my £4 19s 6d three-speed Swift, over the new roads of jarrah-wood blocks in which the rails of electric trams were embedded.

Pheasants, hares, plover, pigeons could still be seen in the fields a mile or so from the school; trout idled in the upper reaches of the Ravensbourne, although the roach, rudd and willows of its tributary Quaggy were gone, the brook running smooth and unwimpling in a concrete bed under a pavement before new tall shops in the High Street. I felt this change mournfully, for the spirit of wild life was now dominant in my secret living.

In winter, fogs of deep yellow often made dark the midday and it was cold. The windows of the sixth form were invariably closed, where 32 boys sat in pairs at sixteen varnished desks, grooved with many a knife, pencil and pen recording initials, devices, while unending thoughts moved without will through heads avoiding the keen blue eyes and pink dome of wisdom, truth and honour everlastingly striving to uplift dull nature to the peaks. The classroom had for me a distressing smell, with hot air arising from pipes under gratings. Ceaselessly the head, a brilliant scholar named F. W. Lucas, urged us to work harder, to get that mental power, illustrated by clenched fist vibrated like a metronome across his own brows. In his young manhood this exceptionally gifted man had obtained first place in the honours list for English history, language and literature at London University, together with first place for his MA degree in logic, philosophy and economics; he had also taken a research course in psychology for his PhD at Freiburg, under Professor Munsterberg.

"Hard at it, boys, hard at it! Get that mental power! I saw your eyes, Williamson! Foxy, sir, foxy! No sugar in your tea for a week? Agreed? Very well. Now concentrate. Quite quiet, boys, quite quiet!" He would leave the room for a few minutes. Immediately the silence would erupt into gusty relief. "Open the window, for God's sake. I'm stifling!" One unheeded cry among a buzz of voices. Perhaps the study door behind us would open suddenly, catching a figure pointing at the moisture running down the windows.

"Come along, Sir! I'll give you that cane! You will have to leave this school, Sir, if you are not careful!", etc. Perhaps the offender would be reprieved, owing to the (exaggerated) terror on his face, and sentence be commuted to the head's favourite charity. "Do you agree to pay tuppence to the Fresh Air Fund, Sir? You do. Put Williamson's name down for tuppence, Latymer. Next time, Sir, you will not get off so lightly. You are the worst boy in the school, Sir!"

But he was not always the falcon stooping upon lesser birds, who could not emulate his flight and vision. He was courtesy itself to those who pleaded headaches, toothaches, earaches, etc. Many did, to excuse lack of preparation. I discovered a rare bird, then almost unknown, during a "visit to the dentist" in the Fox Grove Woods at Beckenham—a willow titmouse.

In my own eyes, without undue concern, I knew myself to be a coward, poor at games, an idiot at Euclid, etc, etc. I left just before the Great War arose in my mind with excitement and fear and secret hope that it would not subside into peace, on that blue and sunlit August Bank Holiday of 1914. If I was the worst boy, the most brilliant scholar, who in my second year at the Heath School (to give it its original name) went on to Rugby, was the headmaster's son, now a don at Cambridge. He was older than I, but I remember my admiration for his achievement, which was to head the Senior Cambridge Local list throughout Great Britain for the year, with first class honours and distinctions in many subjects, including Greek. I can still see him standing by the parallel bars in Big Hall after the lists had come and the head had said : "Now you shall all know your fates!" as he stood modestly outside the sixth form room, his blue eyes lowered in the sensitive face of a poet.

My tears have been clouds these many decades ; my hate, or strangled love, was never strong. "The Old Bird," I have often thought, took on an heroic task ; he should not have worn himself out in a London suburban school of 300 boys, but have been a tutor at, soon surely to have become Master of, one of the colleges at the ancient Universities ; for his mental range was wide and he lived to instil and to pass on his abiding love of the flowers of our western civilization, based on "the radiance of Hellas". I remember him with affection, as I remember most of the faces of my time at the school, including the hundred or so of my generation who were killed in the 1914-18 War.

Colin MacInnes

Colin MacInnes, who died of cancer on April 22, aged 61, was a formidable lion of a man. He viewed human life with affection, objectivity and moral passion; he hated pretentiousness, pettiness and political cant, and stood, as one friend wrote this week, "for minorities, sexual freedom, travelling as light as possible, the gaiety of anarchism, the world as an oyster rather than a burden".

His father was the baritone J. Campbell MacInnes, his mother the novelist Angela Thirkell, who was in turn the daughter of the Greek scholar, J. W. Mckail, the granddaughter of the Pre-Raphaelite painter Burne-Jones, and a cousin of both Rudyard Kipling and Stanley Baldwin.

Intensely aware of his distinguished and talented ancestry, Colin remained essentially a social rebel. He refused a commission during the war, preferring to serve as an NCO. Although he never had much money, he was generous, yet he refused the inheritance which his mother finally left him.

He was educated in Australia, spent his late teens working with a British company in Belgium, came to London and studied painting at the Euston Road School, and then worked in the Intelligence Corps, from which he derived an inquisitorial technique which he was never to lose. After the war he began a career in radio, putting his recently acquired skills to good effect and writing a total of 1,500 very varied programmes. He later wrote that this period had taught him three useful lessons—how to seize and hold the listener's interest, how to write to length, and how to edit oneself.

His first two books, To the Victors, the Spoils (1950) and June in Her Spring (1952) reflected earlier autobiographical matters, but it was with his trilogy of London life that his reputation became really firmly established. City of Spades (1957), Absolute Beginners (1960), and Mr Love and Justice (1962) dealt for the first time with the metropolis of immigrants, teenagers, prostitutes and policemen. His later books include studies of music hall, and of bisexuals and bisexuality.

He knew a great deal about an astonishing range of subjects, yet he wore his erudition lightly, never allowing it to cloud his direct human response to his subject matter. He took journalism very seriously and, as readers of these columns over the past few years will be aware, he could, say, in 1,000 words, more about Arnold Bennett, Yukio Mishima, Colette, Chinese history, or life in the armed forces than many writers have said with weighty tomes.

Most people found him "difficult". Conversations, even relationships, tended to take place on his terms. He intentionally enraged people he did not like, and he was prone to stormy relationships with friends. As a companion, he was always intellectually provocative, and usually fascinating. There was an agreeable astringency about his austere, military approach to situations.

Discreet to the point of secretiveness, he fought his painful illness with almost unbelievable hope and courage, insisting on coming to London to continue his work when he scarcely had the strength to walk. He wrote, for the TES, the articles which we print below, a few days before his death. They retain, to a remarkable degree, the vigour, humour and rich allusiveness which characterise his work as a whole.

Rumblings from Ecclefechan

Carlyle Past and Present, Essays edited by K. J. Fielding and Rodger L. Tarr.
Vision Press £4.95. 85478 373 3.

If one wishes adequately to grasp the thought, mood and writings of the early and mid-Victorian eras, one must sooner or later confront the volcano that was Thomas Carlyle. For years, one skirts around it, climbing foothills instead, or in the case of Ruskin, an equally lofty, yet more accessible peak. But on all of these, the flames from Ecclefechan cast their glowering glare; till resigned to the encounter, one casts around for helpful paths of access to the summit.

Why one so fearsome? First, because we know that Carlyle, read by thousands in the last century, is now read by almost none save scholars . . . and surely this popular judgment cannot be wholly wrong? Next, if we do confront the master—trying first, probably, his less forbidding study of the French revolution—we find the tone of it so dense, so initially impenetrable, that we are discouraged; and what is more perplexing, that it did not seem to be history as we understand it, but a convoluted drama which the writer evokes as if he had been himself a part of it. To these one must add, I fear, Carlyle's formidable Scottishness; for his voice has that didactic tone of the gnostic domine, and a moral arrogance that so many readers find repellent.

Scholars hardly help by telling us his was a "prophet"; and what does this mean. We wonder, and why did our ancestors love a prophet so, and we so little? It turns out to mean that though, in one sense, historian, philosopher, pedagogue and poet, Carlyle was a moral critic of his whole century. As for the Victorian fondness for such figures, this may be explained by the collapse of religious dogma and the search for substitutes, by the mania for education of the new middle classes, and by their apparently boundless capacity for absorbing rhetoric—also made manifest in their extreme love of interminable sermons. Perhaps we may also modestly concede that our forefathers were more serious and laborious thinkers than are we—for has not Alberto Cammo told us that, of the intellectual life of our own ago, posterity will say, "They read the newspapers and fornicated"?

To surmount these obstacles, two devices are of assistance: to read not a general introductory essay—which may only confound the problem—but a selection on particular aspects of the Carlylean world-view. Such is the present collection which, if it omits some aspects of the master's ethos, presents others with vivacity and clarity. One can also, of course, try first a biography, or read the prophet's fascinating letters—more immediately human documents than his essays—yet here the danger is that having done this, one may fancy one has "read Carlyle".

The other tactic is to approach the great tomes themselves, and tackle them frontally as one would if assailing a volcano; that is, boldly, not fearing possible explosions, and ready to beat a swift retreat if necessary—in other words, do not be afraid to skip, and return later for more if the style seems at first too hermetic.

Minor Calylean qualities, at any rate, will soon be apparent: his energy, his scholarship, his passionate irony; the impression he gives that all human phenomena are interrelated, that all matter, and he minds about each of them; and that he is never afraid of seeming rash, perverse, or expressing highly unpopular opinions. Such is his eloquence, indeed, that a sense of tedium may soon be replaced by one of exhilaration.

C. B. Tennyson, in his opening essay, suggests that Carlyle was viewed by his contemporaries as a Prophet, his posthumous detractors as a Denouncer, and now is seen increasingly as an influence; though since the Victorians really saw him as all three, I think what this really means is that nowadays we do not like the first two categories so much.

This "notorious" theme was the adulation of heroes, both in the abstract and in the strange shape of Frederick II of Prussia; but his obsessions are so rich and varied as to cover almost all topics of current pre-occupation—including science, for he was first trained as a mathematician.

Like Nietzsche, with whom he had certain affinities, he has been blamed by posterity for the subsequent worship of inspirited cretins like Hitler, and it is true his tone of wrathful vengeance, coupled with his anti-liberal opinions, help to explain this superficial view. To really to savour the mood and essence of Carlyle's "message", one must go finally to the texts; and the editors help additionally here with copious quotes which show Carlyle at his most dogmatic, astringent and ironical.

The mysterious middle classes

The First Cuckoo: letters to "The Times" 1900-75. Chosen and introduced by Kenneth Gregory.
Times Books/Allen and Unwin £4.50. 04 808025 X.

If you write a letter to The Times, what happens? If it gets printed, well and good; yet before it is, you may receive a courteous telephone call from the journal, asking if you would consent to this cut, or that modification—proposals usually of a reasonable nature. No word of the letter, if printed, will in any case be altered. If, however, it is not to be, you get a polite letter, giving some sort of a reason why. One thing The Times will not do, I think reasonably, is print you if you have sounded-off recently on the same topic elsewhere.

How does the letters editor select his dozen or so specimens from the hundreds he gets daily? The First Cuckoo may suggest reasons for his choice, of which some would seem to be: that it is well written, and not too discursive; that it does not flog, or exaggerate, a purely personal hobby-horse; that the theme is one of national, local or social interest, or imitates some novel, yet not too cranky, notion; that it gives vent to some beguiling eccentricity.

Does having a letter printed reveal you, as it is often said to do, as a member, or a potential one, of the "establishment"? Well, though it often does, not really; for the journal (or "the paper" as Times staff call it, there being of course no other) certainly prints rebels and unknowns; though perhaps a case could be made that to get printed makes you a probationary member of The Times's own mysterious establishment.

The present selection ranges far and wide over the possible topics for inclusion, though there are some obvious ones, such as national events or obsessions (for example, cricket); plausible complaints about arbitrary or misguided action by those in authority (of a kind The Times itself does not like, as bureaucratic arrogance); or characteristic instances of not too dotty English eccentricity. I think the "amusing" examples have rather excessive pre-eminence, the more significant, but perhaps that is to make the book more generally acceptable and entertaining.

Who reads these letters? Well, I think everyone who takes The Times; and it is notorious that many readers turn to the letter page first, doubtless to spot developing trends of national thought, or to follow a "continuing" correspondence that interests them, or for the simplest reason of all, that most of the letters are indeed well written. England seems to be infested with literate, somewhat opinionated persons, who can write a brief, cogent, and often amusing letter; and indeed, even foreigners admit that there is no other letter page quite like The Times; which can easily be confirmed by reading those of other "top" papers, whose panache, brevity, let alone good sense, are invariably inferior to the professional text surrounding them.

As to why The Times features the page so prominently, the evident first reason is that it is so popular; another, to my wicked mind, is that the journal gets excellent free copy—the "opinion" page centre-opposite must cost the newspaper, in fees to outside contributors, some hundreds of pounds daily. Perhaps the strongest reason, though, is that the letter page, like the excellent obituary columns, have now become a journalistic institution.

Yet a question rarely asked (and certainly not so by the editors of the collection) is whether these letters—especially those on topics of real significance—have ever effected any changes in national policy; or are merely from suppressors of vain causes, letting off steam. I think the answer is that on vital questions, e.g., of governmental policy—however clearly misguided to one and all—they have no effect whatever; though it might be true that The Times letters, in the rarest cases, do initiate political or local ideas that eventually become more general. But on minor, yet important topics—for instance, genuinely outrageous examples of official misbehaviour—I think letters, if there are sufficient of them, and signed by the "right" names, can have some practical effect; at any rate, the victims of such attacks, even if powerful, do sometimes answer the letters themselves in The Times columns.

For the foreigner, I think the page provides an excellent key to the mysterious English character—or, at all events, that of its educated middle class; to its pomposity, its crankiness, and its rarer good sense and wit. On the principle of "know your enemy", I have no doubt most journalists scan the page, probably politicians, and doubtless the KGB, which is famed for probing the entire capitalist press for clues.

For, in addition to the possibly unconscious self-revelation of the circumstances, after publication they stand committed, and can be, and are, quoted from it (often to their detriment) years after.

Microcosm and macrocosm

Richard Whitfield on curriculum pragmatic.

From Communication to Curriculum. By Douglas Barnes.
Penguin 90p. 014 08 0382 3.
Schools Council Working Paper No. 55: "The Curriculum in the Middle Years".
Evans/Methuen £2.80. 423 50250 6.
Middle Schools. By T. Gannon and A. Whalley.
Heinemann Educational £3.95. 435 80321 2.

If the stress of the school debate of the sixties was about institutional structures and curriculum renewal within many of the traditional subject areas, that of the seventies looks like being about the logically more important fields of the design of the whole curriculum and the nature of the interaction between teachers and taught in the classroom. The latter field is the "sharp end" of the curriculum, and our most elegant analyses of curriculum aims, sequencing and timetable at the "macro" level founder, unless the spirit in which they are justified is translated into the "micro" life of the classroom on a wide scale.

Douglas Barnes and his associates with backgrounds in the teaching of English have been among those who have demonstrated alarming gaps between the linguistic patterns and perceptions of teachers and pupils in classroom incidents. Yet the taking of the teacher's world and moulding it sensitively and individually around the mental and emotional topology of some 30 children in a classroom may be an impossible task; furthermore, misunderstanding and alienation may from time to time be the necessary negative bipoles which make understanding and identification significant.

Barnes's latest book reminds us that teachers have a vital part to play in assisting pupils to recede experience through the sensitive use of language, so that school knowledge becomes "action knowledge". The use by the teacher of largely pupil-directed small groups is considered by Barnes to be an important technique for the achievement of meaningful learning in the classroom—as if egocentricity on the part of the teacher is a necessary adjunct to teacher/class discussion. While it may be difficult to dispute this point, it would be more convincing if the design of Barnes's investigations were more structured than a series of case studies (albeit interesting) in which the criteria for selection, whether of lesson or transcript extracts are not made clear. Barnes gives us some useful descriptive concepts drawing extensively on psychological and sociological theory and some empirical findings, but the concepts are often unnecessarily polarized (e.g. the transmission teacher versus the interpretation teacher, preparation for life versus initiation into a mystery), and there is far too little attention given to the epistemological distinctions between school subjects which necessarily must, relativism notwithstanding, shape in part the use of language in the classroom.

Whether Barnes makes a significant new contribution to curriculum theory is doubtful, since emphasis on interactive process variables, rather than viewing curriculum solely in product terms is hardly a new notion, but there is a good deal here to stimulate any teacher and the possible implications are far-reaching.

It is perhaps an understatement to note that Schools Council publications on curricular matters are eclectic and diverse. The lack of adequate scholarship and structure in matters relating to frameworks for the whole curriculum (and therefore examinations) has been the Council's most tragic failure. While comprehensive reorganization has gone on unabated in the LEAs, with all that that implies, the Council has done little to characterize a comprehensive curriculum for the nine to 16-year-old.

Hence during a period in which staff structures (and therefore curriculum structures) in middle and secondary schools have been uniquely fluid, teachers and administrators have had to find their own pragmatic atheoretical "solutions" about curricular patterns for comprehensive education. The Council's 13 to 16 Whole Curriculum Working Party report (Working Paper No 53) published late last year, typically reflects how the Council in practice sacrifices any notion of equality of curricular opportunity (which is surely what comprehensive education should be centrally concerned with) upon an ill-conceived altar of individual school and teacher autonomy. Working Paper 53 was a large committee rather than project team effort, and it bore all the marks of lack of definition, compromise and the supermarket approach; it provided neither a clear paradigm for practitioners to follow, nor a stimulant to prompt critics to devise and justify their own alternatives.

Alec Ross and his associates in the Middle Years of Schooling Project have been more helpful to the schools, notwithstanding the committee gauntlet through which their much delayed final report has clearly had to run. The authors believe that the curriculum should be the result of at least some conscious planning, and although there are weaknesses of analysis, they legitimately suggest four criterion content areas for planning the middle school curriculum: basic skills, empirical studies, aesthetics and morality. It is within the perspective of these four interdependent areas that subject-based studies are to find their place.

What is being suggested is a partially differentiated curriculum intermediate in character between the integrated infant/lower junior programme and the 13 to 16 (or 18) programme, which, if we devised more appropriate examining frameworks and really believed in general education, would be characterized by a proper reflection of the various modes of consciousness through which man has tried to make sense out of his predicament. The working paper gives some interesting views on the all-important concept of "balance", but the unfortunate refusal to characterize this in quantitative terms results in our not being provided with detailed exemplars of what "judicial balance" might be. Unless a discussion of the whole curriculum can be illustrated in lesson and timetable terms, it achieves no more utility than interesting philosophical background which school staffs find great difficulty in applying to their own local contexts.

The practical yet complex questions in curriculum design, which can be summed up as "How much? Of what? When? And How?", must not be lost sight of as we plunder educational theory for guidelines. Yet there is a good deal of sense in this report for the perceptive reader who tries to ignore the disclaimers devised by those who believe that the last thing the Schools Council should do is to say something which would be of significance to every middle school. Without detailed follow-up courses the report can only gather dust.

Gannon and Whalley are two middle school headmasters who make up for some of the deficiencies of Working Paper 55; indeed the two volumes are complementary. Here we have case studies and a profusion of practical detail (much from their own schools) which will no doubt be of great interest to other middle school teachers. The arguments about the aims and structure of the middle school curriculum are superficial, yet it is on these that most aspects of management and internal school organization (which are covered in much more detail) depend. In particular there is some confusion between aims and methods, of areas of understanding and psychological abilities; of the five areas of knowledge suggested, "Craft and Practical" (pragmatics) appear distinctive from "Creative and Expressive Arts" (aesthetics), though the distinguishing criteria are not specified. Attention to the child's "needs" and "flexibility of approaches" thus lacks an argued substructure, unless the confusion of models (some of which are fascinating) are intended to be prescriptive, in which case the nature of the various categories is vital for both macro and micro planning by the teaching staff.

Here, then, are three different and interesting books—sometimes stimulating, sometimes superficial. Each illustrates in its own way the severe difficulties of writing scholarly yet practical material in the field of curriculum. We are clearly far from short of ideas and innovations, but some day these ideas must be drawn together across the age boundaries five to eight, nine to 13, 13 to 16 and 16 to 19 so that our children can receive a much more coherent pattern of education than they do now. This will mean a far greater emphasis on shared experience and skills to complement the concept of individual differences; it will mean recognizing that both teachers and taught are likely to perform more effectively if the framework of aims, content and methods at different stages of child development is clarified; security is a benchmark for flexibility.

If we are to take the egalitarian ideal seriously, then our curricula should provide all children with intellectual, emotional and practical tools which are not infinitely variable; it demands a restraining of the excesses of teacher autonomy for the children's sake; it demands curricular leadership, which after a decade of Schools Council developments it might have the courage to take on. Only then will the major suggestions for examination reform be really worthy of our attention.

Solitary pistol shots

David Wright on the French Romantics

The Young Romantics. By Linda Kelly.
Bodley Head £3.75. 370 10264 9.

Since one usually thinks of France as begetter of literary schools and movements, it comes as quite a surprise to be reminded that the Romantic movement in France was touched off by the English.

In 1827, a London theatrical company visited Paris to present a season of Shakespearean drama. The poetry and Elizabethan gusto of Hamlet and Romeo and Juliet, with their disregard of the unities, and rumbustious scrub occurring on stage instead of off it (as demanded by the chill classical convention of the Comédie Française) swept the board with the Parisians and burst like a bomb upon young intellectuals who were just beginning their careers as poets. During the long Napoleonic wars French classicism had ossified; moreover, as someone remarked to Stendhal, "Since the campaign in Russia, Iphigénie en Aulide no longer seems such a good play".

And what a muster of young genius was at hand—Victor Hugo, Sainte-Beuve, Berlioz, Alfred de Musset, George Sand, Gérard de Nerval, Delacroix, Prosper Mérimée, Alexandre Dumas, Théophile Gautier, Alfred de Vigny. The young Hugo, whose apartment became their meeting-place, became the central figure of the group, which was christened "The Cénacle". War was declared on the Comédie Française; Hugo's preface to his play of Cromwell became the Romantic manifesto, much as Wordsworth's preface to Lyrical Ballads had been 30 years earlier.

It was Dumas who made the breakthrough with Henri III at the Théâtre Français. This was followed by Vigny's translation of Othello: "The word mouchoir created an uproar among the classicists; never before had an object of such vulgarity been mentioned on the stage of the Théâtre Français." (Previous translations had replaced the fatal handkerchief with a diamond bagatelle.) This theatrical revolution was accomplished by 1830, the year of the July Revolution, with the hugely successful production of Hugo's Hernani, which was hissed and contested scene by scene by an audience of embattled romanticists and classicists until the actors exhausted by night after night of continuous uproar, the play was taken off.

In The Young Romantics Linda Kelly has achieved an extraordinarily interesting portrait of this period, combined with a skilfully-plotted collective biography of the protagonists of the Romantic movement—Hugo, Vigny, Sand, Musset, Dumas and Sainte-Beuve. With neat economy and dry wit her book presents the intricate web of their relationships with one another and complicated network of wives, mistresses, and lovers; fervent admiration ending in deadly enmity, violent attachment in bored detachment.

Like a well-planned novel, it opens and closes with two offscrive set-pieces. It begins in 1827, with Sainte-Beuve, a shy hero-worshipper calling on the young Victor Hugo, and ends 10 years later with the two men at the funeral of the daughter of Vigny's mistress, sharing a carriage in the silence of a mutual hatred. In between, what affairs and betrayals (Sainte-Beuve became Hugo's wife's lover), duels, jealousies and suicides (Vigny's Chatterton almost made suicide a cult: "Those were the days", wrote Gautier, "when you could hear the crack of solitary pistol shots in the night").

It is a short but meaty book and entertaining too. Linda Kelly has a good eye for the unintentionally comic. I enjoyed Sainte-Beuve outraging duelling etiquette by putting up his umbrella before exchanging shots with his opponent: "I have no objection to getting killed, but I do mind getting wet."

Senior School Mathematics
M. KEEPING £2.45

This new book provides a basis for a one-year course for pupils in the 15-18 age range by introducing branches of mathematics which are new to school mathematics and in developing some familiar topics. Among the subjects covered are chapters on probability, coastal navigation, the use of calculating machines, flow chart programming and the use of mathematics in industry.
Pupils studying for the proposed Certificate of Extended Education could find the subjects covered useful.

Multiple Choice Questions on Advanced Level Mathematics
R. W. PAYNE and D. B. PENNYCUICK £1.95

Covers the London G.C.E. A-level syllabus in Mathematics and Further Mathematics to be examined from June 1977, and should also be of value to students taking A-levels of other boards, and to teachers of mathematics in sixth-forms and colleges.
"This book is more interesting and unlike than its title suggests, since it is not restricted to the simple type of multiple-choice question, in which the correct answer is hidden among 'distractors'."

Seamus Hegarty on the process of communication

Communications and Media: Constructing a cross-discipline. By G. N. Gordon.
Visual Press £4.75. 8038 1198 5.
A Taxonomy of Concepts in Communication. By R. H. Blake and E. O. Haroldsen.

The Secularization of Leisure: Culture and communication in Israel. By Elihu Katz and Michael Gurevitch.
Faber £6.50. 571 09848 7.

The trouble with communication as an academic pursuit, is that nobody is quite sure where it begins and ends, so that there is little agreement on what the student of communication ought to be studying. The songbird warbling in the mating season is communicating just as is the Prime Minister preaching economic sanity from the television set. The potential range of behaviour is so vast and the methods by which it might be studied so diverse that to many it has seemed fruitless to conceive of a single discipline encompassing it.

Gordon's Communications and Media is yet another effort to delimit the bounds of communications study. As is customary in such endeavours there is general disparagement of others in the field, some of it amusing but most of it insufficiently argued for the non-professional reader. As a result, the author's own position does not come over very clearly. What is valuable is that he does not see sociology and psychology as providing the only perspectives; this runs counter to a major trend in communications study in America. However, he is not as attentive to alternative methodologies as one might wish. Critical and analytic approaches are exemplified but not given the epistemological discussion required in the context. This is certainly not a book for the beginner.

Blake and Haroldsen's Taxonomy is a collection of brief explanations of some basic concepts in communication. Brevity is the keynote—language and symbols receive half a page each. The concepts are clustered under headings: basic elements of communication (eg language, message, noise), forms of communication (eg interpersonal, rumour, mass media), and so on. The book falls somewhere between a technical dictionary and an encyclopedia, but, unfortunately, many of the concepts are not suited to this kind of treatment. One sees the point of an extended definition of canalization or adoption curves but the same treatment given to language or socialization or mass culture is not very illuminating. A glance at Raymond Williams's recent Keywords puts Taxonomy in perspective and shows how very limited in scope it is.

For many people the only mass medium of interest is television. Barnouw's Tube of Plenty tells the story of American television from its early days to the Nixon debacle. It is a story pure and simple, full of anecdotes and gossipy sidelines. For example, when Spiro Agnew decided to have a go at the television networks and diminish their credibility in the public's eyes, Bob Hope sent his gag-writers to help with scripts. On his return from China in 1972, Nixon stopped over in Alaska for several hours in order to arrive at Washington in prime television time.

It seems as if an age has passed since the Nixon/Kennedy debates in 1960. Both men have had their spell of the Presidency, using television to consolidate its power as never before; both ended calamitously, cut short of their full term, in the full glare of television cameras. There have been the civil rights movements, the space programmes, the assassinations, the campus riots, Watergate, the horror of Vietnam. The world was tuned into American public life, which seemed to be staged largely for the benefit of the ubiquitous television camera. Newspaper receptures is all and makes it read like a gripping novel. The story is absorbing but there is only the story; one must not expect explanations of what happened or why it happened or how it is related to other elements in society.

The Politics of Communication is at a totally different level. Television and the other media do more than simply inform. The interaction between the executive arm of government and prevailing communication systems, illustrated so well by Barnouw in respect of the American Presidency and television, raises central questions about the nature of political cohesion. How important to political stability is it to have control over the means of public communication? How in fact has this control been exercised?

Mueller draws on results from studies carried out in many fields from linguistics to political science, to build an account of the way that political consciousness (and capacity for effective action) is a function of the available channels of communication. The account is couched in terms of "distorted communication" which is seen to have three forms: directed, arrested and constrained.

Directed communication results from explicit government action as in the Third Reich where there was a formal policy of language manipulation. Arrested communication occurs when individuals are incapable of taking an effective part in the political process because of sociolinguistic deprivation; the best examples here draw on Bernstein's notion of restricted speech codes. Constrained communication refers to communication that takes for granted (and thereby reinforces) the biases and legitimations of dominant group interests. This is Mueller's most fertile idea. It depends on the notion of systematic bias without which much of Western democracy/capitalism would be unintelligible. The discussion here is exemplified largely by recent developments in American political life.

This is an important book that raises major questions about the exercise of power and the nature of political stability. There are many points with which one will disagree—some of the empirical studies adduced in evidence could be interpreted differently or have been superseded by later work—but it will be a fertile disagreement. One cannot reject Mueller's arguments lightly or without clarifying one's own thinking.

The Secularization of Leisure is a national audit of patterns of communication and leisure in Israel. The empirical work was done in 1970 when a temporary peace reigned in the Middle East—and the consumption of culture was untypical? However, what gives the book its value is not the detailed figures on patterns of consumption (and there are a great many of them) but the effort to locate cultural consumption in the broader context of society's attitudes and values and to determine its relevance to social planning.

Poet without a lyre?

Hermann Peschmann on Robert Browning

Browning: "Men and Women" and Other Poems. A selection of critical essays. Edited by J. R. Watson. Macmillan (Casebook series) £2.95. 333 14965 3. Paperback £1.20. 14966 1.

By general consent Browning's most enduring and, for us, most accessible, work is the lyrics and dramatic monologues in Dramatic Lyrics (1842), Dramatic Romances and Lyrics (1845) and the 51 poems comprising the original Men and Women (1855). These are the three volumes covered by this casebook, admirably introduced by J. R. Watson; its publication marks the revived interest in Browning over the last decade, with Philip Drew even claiming in 1970 that Browning is "our man in the nineteenth century."

Here, among much else, are two extracts from Vasari, source material for "Fra Lippo Lippi" and "Andrea del Sarto"; J. S. Mill's dismissive "Note on Pauline" that so upset Browning; George Eliot's well intentioned but imperfectly sympathetic review of Men and Women; "He sets our thoughts at work rather than our emotions. He does not take possession of our souls and set them aglow as the greatest poets . . . do"; Swinburne's (predictable!) championing of Browning's "Clarity"; Henry James's musings on Browning's burial in the Abbey in 1891, seeing Browning as "unmistakably in the great tradition" yet "a poet without a lyre"; and there are good things in the paradoxes and gusto of Chesterton on the gusto and paradoxes of Browning—he would surely have agreed with James that "none of the odd ones have been so great and none of the great ones so odd."

But after Chesterton the old order changeth and giveth place to the Richard/Leavis school of Practical Criticism; and the most searching essays here, mostly by American scholars, comprise the rest of the book.

E. D. H. Johnson, in "Authority and the Rebellious Heart", stresses the intuition and anti-intellectualism in Browning's verse, and his challenge to Victorian sexual morality: "His interest is in the fulfilment of passion rather than in the preservation of domestic proprieties"; "The Statue and the Bust" is the supreme example. Patricia Ball compares Browning and Beckett, finding in him not the "brash optimist" but a common concern with "the blinkered human mind", with Caliban, Childe Roland and Porphyria's Lover finding not God but only Godot:

"And thus we sit together now,
And all night long we have not stirred,
And yet God has not said a word!"

And there are sensitive critiques of "The Bishop Orders his Tomb", "The Statue and the Bust", and "Andrea del Sarto" by Roma King, W. O. Raymond, and Richard Altick respectively. The book ends with two amusing verse parodies by C. S. Calverley and J. K. Stephen.

The most valuable extract in the book, however, is Robert Langbaum's "Sympathy versus Judgment", a penetrating analysis of the nature of the dramatic monologue, the profundities which it can explore, and the subtleties to which it is susceptible. Such monologues "give facts from within; a dramatic understanding of the person speaking which implies a dramatic sympathy with him", the sympathy taking priority over moral judgment, and the tension between the two resulting in "an effect of lyrical intensity".

This triumph of sympathy over moral judgment is exactly what E. D. H. Johnson means in emphasizing "Browning's advocacy of intuitive over rational knowledge". Langbaum's article enlarges our understanding of the genre, and would in itself make this excellent book worth buying by all actual or potential Browning students.

Schemes for success

Careers Without O Levels. By Margaret Korving and Jim Davidson. BBC Publications £1.00. 0 563 12849 6.

O levels are valuable, but they are no substitute for determination and initiative, or for assets like personality, imagination and staying power. Such words of encouragement for those who lack academic qualifications recur frequently in Careers without O Levels, a new BBC publication based on a series in Radio 4's "You and Yours". The authors, Margaret Korving and Jim Davidson, are both professional careers advisers.

The book consists of chatty yet informative interviews with 20 people, who outline their varied careers. Melvyn Dean, 29, a regional careers adviser on a basic salary of £4,040, admits he had to join the Civil Service "as a temporary labourer sweeping out the yard at the Ministry of Defence—and you can't get much lower than that". The most successful in monetary terms is Donald Yates, who at 30 is earning £8,000 at Tesco as a supermarket manager.

Despite their initial lack of qualifications, all were obviously prepared to work hard, taking advantage of training schemes.

The authors comment on each one, and there are useful details about how to get additional information on the careers in question, which also include the police, journalism, fashion, nursing, catering, social work and farming. Altogether it is a very readable book, full of practical advice and considerable encouragement.

Poetry Dimension 2: The Best of the Poetry Year. Edited by Danny Abse.
Robson Books £2.75. 0 903895 24 2.

Poetry used, like Keats's Grecian Urn, to be the foster-child of silence and slow time. Now it's urgent copy, or at least some of it is. The upshot can be a correlative crudity of effect even in some talented poets represented here, a selection of poems culled from books and magazines in 1974: Tony Harrison sometimes seems to confuse being hard-boiled and cynical with appropriate realism; Alasdair MacLean and Ted Walker both show the imprint of early Ted Hughes without the manic intensity, the short, fierce fuse—but the former sometimes goes limp, while the latter goes too far after his mentor in giving us real, vivid animals but purely emblematic humans. Gavin Ewart and D. J. Enright are witty and slapdash, while Vernon Scannell is instant communication and hilarious with it—though sometimes one wonders when he actually intends comedy ("My hound of love gets up and begs/At titbits time has failed to stale"). But he is not the first poet to appear to be parodying the manner he (masochistically) loves being stuck with. Some good poets (Peter Porter, Norman McCaig) are represented by feeble offerings, some callow canticles are just epitaphs on their authors' ambitions. Is it altogether fair to expose them in this random sweeping into public places?

It is inevitable here to feel one is fumbling through a barrel of sawdust encountering the occasional grape: the best of the poetry year? Poetry is not just a commodity, a "marketable vice" (Byron's phrase), and one cannot really expect to find a word-hoard waiting every Hogmanay. For good measure let us take exception to the title as well as the subtitle of this collection, Poetry Dimension 2 having a kind of media-jargon boffinism and modishness as if suggesting the imminent appearance of a little green Philip Larkin with a television aerial on his head.

The poetry is eked out by literary journalism. There's a lot of it about, but this includes some of the best of it—Larkin on Betjeman, Davie on Lowell, Anthony Thwaite on the (alleged) "Two Poetries", and an indispensable one by Roland Mathias on Dylan Thomas; this is a careful account of Dylan as Lord Cuglass, the spoilt poseur with all the withdrawal symptoms of the BBC metropolitan who "got above" Wales—but still oddly sympathetic. Excellent stuff.

Editions and additions

Supplement to Sources for the History of Education. Edited by Dr C. W. J. Tilgson.
The Library Association £12.50 (members £10). 85365 238 4.

This new supplement, together with its predecessor, provides an extensive bibliography of source material for the history of education, including old textbooks and children's books.

Covering material added to the libraries of the institutes and schools of education (and works from certain university libraries) between 1965 and 1974, it is arranged in broad chronological periods from fifteenth to seventeenth-century publications to government publications up till 1918. Most of the additions are of books published before 1700 and nineteenth-century children's books.

A subject and an author index to government publications help in the use of this bibliography; the books listed are, with a few exceptions, available through the Inter-Library Loan system.

Hilary Finch

In 1970, when Children's Book News ceased to be, Valerie Alderson started up Children's Book Review, a quarterly journal of articles and reviews which she now edits and administers single-handed and which can boast subscriptions in Japan, Kuwait, Poland and Yugoslavia as well as all over Europe.

Most of the books reviewed are for the middle to secondary school age range; reviewers are school teachers, librarians, writers and lecturers. Over the past four years, leading articles have been written on children in art, encyclopedias, and nineteenth-century publishing, and occasional lists—insets covering particular interests like "Posters and Paraphernalia", alphabets and number books appear every so often. The next issue will come out in September, and Valerie Alderson hopes to include in it a series of articles on the history of children's literature.

"A check-list of books for children and young people published for their amusement and instruction by John Harris and his Son" between 1801 and 1843 has just reappeared under the auspices of Five Owls Press, the publishers of Children's Book Review.

Compiled by Marjorie Moon, it is a handsome volume, set out in alphabetical order with a chronological index surveying the activities of the firm of John Harris, a list of pertinent books and catalogues, selections from contemporary reviews, a fascinating introduction about this period of publishing, and many monochrome but well produced illustrations from nineteenth-century alphabets, natural histories, and classics like Dick Whittington, Watts' Divine Songs and The Pilgrim's Progress.

"With covers neat, and cuts so pretty,
There's not its like in all the city;
And that for twopence he could buy
A story-book would make one cry"

This book is not quite such a bargain as the one described in Dame Partlet's Farm, 1804, but for many an aficionado of children's literature it may well be an equally tempting investment.

Warship

Fighting Ships Of World War II. By John Westwood.
Sidgwick and Jackson £4.50. 0 283 98287 X.

In 160 pages and over 100 photographs John Westwood copes manfully with the histories and performances of the fleets of the major combatant countries of World War Two. His accounts of the development of the battleship, the carrier, the cruiser, the submarine and the escort are relived by substantial "biographies" of individual warships. The result is a mix of anecdote and technical data which, if not definitive, is highly readable.

Besides tables giving the tonnage, armament and speed of all major ships, other statistics are set into the text. For battleships and cruisers there are the ratios of speed, armour and armament; among the carriers, speed and armour are set against hangar capacity. Together with the tables which show the prime causes of sinkings throughout the war, the stories and the statistics lend weight to the thesis that the building programmes and strategies of the world's admiralties in the twenties and thirties generally failed to meet their nations' requirements in the eventual shooting-match.

Puffineers

Heather Neill

Puffin Post volume 10 number 1 is a special "topsy-turvy, contrariwise" edition of the Puffin Club's regular magazine to mark the beginning of the club's tenth year. The editor, Kaye Webb, has handed the magazine over to Puffineers themselves and they have written and illustrated it in a most entertaining way. There are short stories, poems, cartoons, jokes, puzzles and features on subjects as disparate as potholing and a trip to New Guinea. There is a delightful description of life on a remote Irish island and an informative profile of William Mayne. The standard of writing is uniformly high: there may well be some future Puffin authors among the contributors. The drawings are frequently humorous and there are, of course, all manner of puffins.

More than mind and spirit

F. R. H. Du Boulay

Medieval Political Thought. By Walter Ullmann.
Penguin £1.75. 014 055 102 6.
Medieval History: The Life and Death of a Civilization. By Norman F. Cantor.
Collier Macmillan £4.15. 02 319 020 5.

Two books already known to students reappear with face-lifts. Professor Ullmann's is an abridgement of a famous book which emanated from Cambridge in 1961, and is intended as a general introduction. He traces the ways in which European men thought about political authority from the time of the Roman Empire until the fifteenth century. Very broadly, he contrasts a "descending" origin of authority from papalist ideas which insisted on the superiority of spirit over matter and of the clergy over secular rulers with an "ascending" origin which was argued with full force in the thirteenth century.

The second theory makes more sense to us today, because it sees political society as natural to human beings and therefore "good" in itself, not just a remedy for sinful human nature. Professor Ullmann does not say much about Roman Law—that wonderful human construction—and while his basic theory may seem over-simple, his style is rather abstract and teutonic.

Professor Cantor is over-intellectualist in a different way. His textbook moves at a fast pace and is full of information and sweeping judgments. But in his medieval world nothing much matters except the life of the mind and spirit. He does not try to show that civilization was made by a few people out of the efforts of millions who grubbed away in furrows, forests and markets. Much worse, he is one of those who thinks the early middle ages corresponded to the youth of a man and the period after about 1270 to that man's senescent death-wish.

"Europe north of the Alps slid into a long and baffling depression that lasted until the middle of the fifteenth century, bringing with it the social discontent and rebellion common to the deflationary phase of the business cycle." This is sad stuff for those who think the later middle ages were less cruel, ignorant and hungry than the earlier. Still, Professor Cantor is generous enough to add a useful reading guide and to recommend some books by his intellectual opponents.

Olly Sees it Through. By Monica Gydal and Thomas Danielsson. When Olly Went to Hospital. 340 19718 8.
When Olly Had a Little Brother. 19719 6.
When Gemma's Parents Got Divorced. 19685 8.
When Olly's Grandad Died. 19684 X. Hodder and Stoughton £1.60 each.

The hero of books for young children is always sure of a big surprise. Once upon a time it was an exciting adventure followed by a nice tea; nowadays he often heads for disaster—a thousand natural shocks in serial form. Unlike the cautionary tale, this new genre does not purport to show the dire consequences of sin; it tells us that life is tough and there are no medals for bravery.

I believe that stories can forewarn and forearm, and there is no harm in therapeutic intentions. But although I welcome the approach in principle, I doubt whether in practice Olly Sees it Through, the work of a psychologist and a television producer, would help a child facing hospital treatment, a new sibling, the divorce of parents or the death of a relative.

The reader needs a clear head to follow the plot through changing scenes, partners and points of view. Several of the characters have the same name: two grandmothers, one living, one dead, are both called Grandma; the terms "Mum and Dad" are applied equally to Olly's parents who stay together and to Gemma's who part. This is clumsy and confusing in a context where angels fear to tread.

The writing is flat—a deliberate plainness since the theme is highly charged and the response may be explosive. The pictures, pleasantly unemphatic, also serve as a container for the reader to fill. Faces lack expression; wherever a sign of feeling might be expected, there is a space. Olly fits his situation like the all-purpose child in a road safety leaflet.

The difficulty here is that an event which could happen to anyone becomes specific and highly individual as soon as it happens. Psychologists abstract the common denominator from unique experiences and so perceive a general problem, but in advising patients they can vary their approach. Writers of fiction, on the other hand, cannot consider alternatives. They must choose one set of circumstances, one course of action, and eliminate others. However hard they try to make their characters representative and their story widely applicable, they are confined to one plot. And the presentation of "a typical case" implies recommendation—"This is the way to handle it"—which stimulates disagreement.

For instance, the single parent has no place in these stories; Gemma's Mum and Dad remarry at once, as if families could not exist without couples. When Olly is admitted to hospital, his mother leaves him despite his pleas, though a British paediatrician might well have encouraged her to stay, and the text could have hinted that it is worth asking. Sometimes a problem can remain open-ended and alternative reactions are suggested, as when Grandma says "Some believe" in life after death, though it is clear that she does not. But such opportunities are rare. In general, the theme represents a maze of multiple choice through which the story traces a single path. This leads the English version in directions the authors never intended.

Hodder and Stoughton's translator, Charles Ellis, has revamped and bowdlerized the original, complicated the narrative, reinforced sex roles, and reasserted parent power, according to his assessment of "what the English market will accept". The authors set out to reassure children; translator concentrates on placating authority. In Swedish Olly protests; in English he shuts up.

It is appropriate that a revised version that stops characters from making a fuss and shows children doing as they are told, should provoke fury, inspire litigation and raise hell. You could say it was another challenging experience to be seen through.

Sturm und drang

Derrick Barlow

A History of German Literature 1760-1805. By Werner Kohlschmidt. Translated by Ian Hilton. Macmillan £15.00. 333 09701 7.

This book is part of a multi-volume translation of a work entitled Geschichte der Deutschen Literatur von den Anfängen bis zur Gegenwart, which is being published in four volumes by Reclam Verlag. It corresponds to the third part of the original volume two. The English title is somewhat misleading, since anyone searching these pages for an account of, say, Lessing's Nathan der Weise, Hölderlin's Hyperion or Novalis's Heinrich von Ofterdingen will be disappointed, even though all these works are accepted literary masterpieces falling within the period covered. The German title—Vom Sturm und Drang zur Klassik—conveys a much better idea of the scope of the work, which actually amounts to a comprehensive study of two major movements in German literature: Storm and Stress and Weimar Classicism.

In fact, Professor Kohlschmidt's starting-points are Hamann (precursor of Storm and Stress) and Winckelmann (father of German classicism), both of whom were already making significant contributions to aesthetics in the 1750s. Nor can the work be described as a history of literature in the conventional sense. True, there are the usual potted biographies of major authors, synopses of important works, and a chronological table at the end; but in addition to all this, the reader is led on frequent excursions into philosophy, sociology, and even pedagogy, although these are always strictly related to the main theme. Moreover, since much of the material is concerned with the history of ideas, value-judgments abound.

For the most part, Professor Kohlschmidt displays a commendable objectivity, and only rarely do his personal prejudices emerge. One such occasion is his cursory dismissal of Goethe's Stella as his limping with magnanimity and heartache, basically unpsychological and undramatic", and another his curious insensitivity to the literary merits of Wieland's work—although he never denies the greatness of that author's intellect, or his importance from a purely sociological standard.

Many readers, too, will probably disagree with his view that the ending of Pioth is artificially engineered solely in order to enable Schiller to introduce a verbal conceit with the words "ertrunken" and "ertrinkt". Incidentally, the effectiveness of this cynical play on words, which Schiller puts into the mouth of the disillusioned Verrina, is necessarily lost in the English translation, making Schiller appear even more inept than Professor Kohlschmidt alleges him to be.

Professor Kohlschmidt provides an admirably lucid account of the main trends of the age, and the breadth of his reading is often astonishing. Inevitably, however, the need to compress so much diverse material into such relatively small space has led to a degree of over-simplification in the treatment of individual works. In the chapter on Goethe's Werther, for example, the hero's lack of a sense of responsibility and his obstinate refusal to persevere are justifiably emphasized. Yet Werther is not quite such an unsympathetic character as this analysis suggests, for even in the revised version of the novel (which is commonly held to present a more objective portrait of Werther than the first version) Goethe still implies that a measure of misunderstanding on the part of Lotte and Albert was at least a contributory factor in his hero's unhappy fate.

A similar over-simplification occurs in the discussion of Schiller's Wilhelm Tell, where we are told that "no discordant note is sounded when the finale claims Tell as the liberator and saviour of the national cause". But surely the acclamation bestowed upon Tell by his compatriots in the final scene must be understood, ironically. The real saviour of the Swiss revolt is not Tell but John of Swabia, whose callous murder of the Emperor fortuitously forestalls any intervention on the part of the Imperial troops. It is no accident that Schiller was fond of depicting myth-figures in his classical plays. The theme of Wilhelm Tell is not so much "the moral assertion of the individual in the raging torrent of history" as the creation of a popular myth through a deliberate distortion of the hard facts of political reality. No wonder that Tell remains silent when he is hailed as a national hero!

Equally, it is insufficient to say of Gerstenberg's Ugolino that here "death is no longer heroic-rhetorical". This is no doubt true of the manuscript draft, which Gerstenberg sent to Lessing in 1767 for his comments, but it is certainly not true of the first published version of the play, where Ugolino accepts his fate with restored moral fortitude, reciting from the Lord's famous reply to Job.

Ian Hilton has produced a faithful and idiomatic rendering of the German text, and any English reader unfamiliar with German, who wishes to obtain an insight into this fascinating period, will have no difficulty in following the narrative, since all German quotations are translated and there is a glossary of technical terms used.

Ecological adventure

Battle for Planet Earth. By Richard Carlyon.
G. Whizzard/Andre Deutsch £1.95. 0 903387 04 2.

The idea of an "ecologically sound" adventure story for children about the tribulations facing planet Earth today is a good one. But this is not a good book. The author has fallen into the trap of thinking that it is easier to write for young people than for adults, when in truth younger readers are apt to pounce on the slightest error, while the illustrator presumably thinks that they will be too busy doing just that to notice the poor standard of the pictures. The recycled paper on which the book is printed may itself be ecologically a good thing, but it helps to give an overall appearance of dingy gloom which could well rebound.

Anyone who has had experience of reading aloud to children will find the lack of continuity between different sections of the book a powerful incentive to avoid letting them see it at all, since the questions raised could be endless. The implication of the disconnected episodes that the best way to tackle pollution is to counter force with force is at once laughable and horrifying. The suggestion, for example, that to stop tankers washing out their oil at sea it is appropriate for the hero to attack their pipes with his trusty knife, while encouraging gulls to swoop "with their razor-sharp beaks" on the crew so that "the men can stay in terror, blood streaming down their hands and faces," tells us more about the philosophy of editorial consultants Friends of the Earth and foreword writer Rolf Harris than it does about how to live on a crowded planet. Come back, The Woombles, all is forgiven.

Man and Wildlife. By L. Harrison Matthews.
Croom Helm £4.95. 0 85664 012 5.

This distinguished author offers us a book which is principally a straightforward account of the ways in which man has always used and depended on the animal kingdom, and of the present state of this relationship.

It is written in a low-key, almost laconic manner, closely informative and factual. It could suit upper secondary pupils as technicalities are, on the whole, avoided. Main groups of animals are examined in relation to man (bees, tapeworms and protozoa are "wildlife", but silkworms are truly domesticated). The whole picture, however, is of our species as an increasingly dependent part of the flow of self-replicating living matter. DNA is the fundamental. All forms of life including ourselves are simply vehicles for transmitting this.

Our man-altered environment is shown to have vastly favoured some species but nearly destroyed others, and human population is the enemy, far more menacing than any other threat. The extermination of species by man is, of course, negligible when compared with "natural" disappearances in the course of evolution, but reduction of numbers is serious. Ethical questions and speculation such as whether man is capable of restraining himself are only discussed briefly and always with despairing irony. In his infrequent divergences from facts the author makes some curious comments such as that it is "prejudice" to enjoy deciduous trees best and "illogical" to like birds more than other creatures.

The most immediately striking feature of this book is its exceedingly poor production—the small unbroken print and stunningly high price for its 126 pages. A batch of not very illuminating photographs appears in the centre.

It is sometimes argued that natives are not the best exponents, or at least not the most useful ones, of their own language and institutions. Moreover, the study of a foreign language and foreign institutions may require a different approach for students of different nationalities. Even if one takes this view, the varied textbooks under review, all coming from French publishers, and, with one or two exceptions, meant for use all over the world, are well worth a good look. They range in standard from the primary stage to advanced study in higher education.

Je Lis Tout Seul—premier étape is a lovely series of short booklets (Je Lis Toute, Dans la Mer, A la Mare, Deux Petits Ours) for French six-year-olds. Attractive illustrations and the repetition of a limited vocabulary render the first steps an easy and pleasant exercise.

Parler et Ecrire avec la Bande Dessinée is a collection of 12 cartoon strips, with five copies of each strip. The detailed explanations and instructions, all in French, should prove useful to the teacher. They could form a good spring-board for practice in the méthode directe.

Un-deux-trois and Un-deux-trois Workbook is a UK adaptation of a Swedish edition. It is the first part of a course "aimed primarily at the pupil of average or less than average ability." (How much longer shall we go on using this odious cliché for wholesale labelling?) The components of the course include tapes, flannelgraph figurines, transparencies for overhead projector and wall pictures. There is also a Part Two, and Part Three is promised for this year. The 47 lessons of Part One are copiously illustrated and avoid monotony. As "grammatical and lexical content have been pared down to an essential minimum" the pupil's progress should not prove too arduous. The authors are probably right in claiming that the lessons present "potentially useful situations"—A Orly, A la douane, En vacances (with exchange of addresses and telephone numbers), and do not fall "beneath the pupil's intellectual dignity".

Textes en Français Facile is a vast collection of readers, comprising several series, with a vocabulary not exceeding 3,500 words of the français fondamental du 2e degré. Five of the nine readers reviewed belong to the Civilization series. La Bretagne has chapters on its history, geography, industry touristic interests and language, with a selective list of useful Breton words—it ends with "La Bretagne en colère". It is illustrated with maps, photographs and drawings.

Cuisine Facile en Français Facile would present GCE candidates, interested both in French and cooking, with fewer problems than it would to this reviewer. It ends with a charming cartoon: "Chéri tu es un chou" is the welcome of the wife sitting at the table as her husband, having donned the kitchen apron, brings in a lovely pièce montée. La Chanson Française Aujourd'hui takes us from Chevalier, Trenet, Edith Piaf to Brassens, Aznavour and Mireille Mathieu. Several photographs, good vocabulary but no music.

Le Cinema Français Aujourd'hui traces its history ("Tout a commence en 1895") leading us up to Louis Malle's Lucien Lacombe. Most famous names appear here: metteurs en scene as well as vedettes, with some statistics and many photographs. La Vie Politique en France deals with the Fifth Republic from 1958 to 1968. Giscard d'Estaing's reign is not included and the voting age is still given as 21. However many of the intricacies of French politics are clearly explained. Useful vocabulary is thus provided for a better understanding of French newspapers.

L'Avare by Molière; "adapte en 1300 mots", belongs to the series Dialogue et Theatre. Not everybody likes to see Molière interfered with, but there is no doubt this provides much easier reading than the original, while retaining much of its comic element. Lire Camus, "rédigé en 3500 mots" in the series Biographies takes us on a supersonic journey through all the novels, plays, Combat etc. Lichet's narrative is interspersed with brief quotations from the originals.

Récits pour les Jeunes, in the series Récits, consists of a selection from the magazine Passe-Partout. The articles cover a great variety of subjects and could easily be enjoyed by sixth formers and good pupils in the fifth. Ecrire à Tout le Monde is a most useful guide to letter and message writing in the series Outils. On the spur of the moment I cannot think of any situation that is not covered in this booklet.

Dictionnaire du Français Facile deals with 300 words "environ" considered as "prioritaires". With drawings and exercises it is a dictionary with a difference. Exercises en Français Facile No 1 is a fairly stimulating workbook of 48 pages for beginners.

Comment Vivent les Français is the first work in a new series, Sélection Pédagogique Internationale, written originally for the Swedish Radio/Television as background reading for programmes on France and the French. It has now been revised for higher education use in all countries. The maps, diagrams and statistics occupy some two thirds of the book and tell us all, or nearly all, about the "vie quotidienne." In La Belle France. Among other things one learns how France compares with other countries in the number of motor cars, refrigerators, washing machines, television sets and baptisms per 1,000 inhabitants.

In their "façons de se distraire" 13 per cent of the French to four per cent over here enjoy themselves by sitting outside their homes and watching the world go by, whereas the percentages are reversed for le petit écran: 33 to 85. The British, as one would expect, are seven times more clubbable and twice more "bricoleurs". However, I find it difficult to believe that France has as many yoga fans as England. The political and economic life receives ample treatment, with all sorts of interesting details in a compact form. There is also a short chapter on la vie culturelle. Whether it all adds up to "la civilisation française" is, of course, questionable.

Le Moulin à Paroles is a course of "Conversation et composition au niveau avancé". In use in American universities since 1961, it has now been revised to be included in the Sélection Pédagogique Internationale. It could very well be considered as suitable for good sixth forms or post A level students. Each of its 14 chapters consists of three parts. The "Charpente" deals with such "notions" as Comment poser une question, Comment faire une réponse négative, L'expression des sentiments, Le But et La Conséquence, L'expression de l'opposition, La relation.

The authors refer to Ferdinand Brunot's La pensée et la langue from which they derived this "grammaire notionnelle". "Materiau" which offers a thematic vocabulary, with fairly demanding "lexicotest" and oral exercises forms the second part. Finally, in "Fendtres 1 and 2" excerpts from contemporary writers are followed by appropriate questions and essays.

All explanations and instructions are in French, including the Avertissement, full of most useful advice to teachers, and an excellent appendix on French phonetics. I find the book attractive and intelligent and would certainly give it a try. There are also accompanying tapes.

La France en Direct, Book Three and Book Four with their Fichiers d'Utilisation are the final volumes of a fine course. They are meant for advanced students of A level and post A level standard. The authors set themselves ambitious aims, and their remarkable achievement deserves more detailed review than space allows here. Book Three is organized in the form of 18 dossiers concentrating on seven or eight main themes that take a look at different aspects of French life, with such titles as La presse aux mille visages, De l'ouvrier au patron, Culture ou contestation, Les Français en rient, L'amour toujours.

In Dossier One, after an outline of its contents and a brief introduction by the authors, excerpts and quotes from newspapers, with only a short dose of statistics, present the reader in a most pleasant manner with a clear and fairly comprehensive picture of the French daily press. The written and oral exercises, including those on phonetics are short, varied and often challenging. The Fichier d'Utilisation (teacher's book) is full of extremely useful suggestions. The volume also includes three textes, that is long passages from well-known novels. A Cahier de phonetique, a Bloc de tests (84 pages for five pupils) and tapes can be ordered to accompany Book Three.

Book Four is described as "le prolongement et l'aboutissement" of the course. In addition to vast extracts from Candide, Vol de nuit and Les Mains sales, it contains short passages from some 25 writers, prominently of the twentieth century. These have been grouped under four chapter headings: Edification (salient moments and values in French history), Contestation (criticism and renewal), Acceptation (currents of thought not less powerful) and Evasion (liberation of the individual seen from the literary point of view).

Each chapter is subdivided into four dossiers. Authors and excerpts have been selected with great care and are most stimulating, and so are the exercises. The Fichier d'Utilisation is again most helpful. These two books, of such high quality, could be a desirable alternative to the four or five set books of the A level syllabus.

I cannot help feeling that this would take into account the great diversity of aptitudes and inclinations among both teachers and students, and would be particularly welcome in classes where all concerned often find the study of those set books a painful and rather tedious exercise. A word of warning though: La plus belle femme ne peut donner que ce qu'elle a—pupils who would make use of this course should not expect an easy way out; their own efforts would have to measure up to this excellent and challenging approach.

A teachers' cooperative with materials on the agenda

Anna Sproule looks at Avon's Resources for Learning Development Unit

The board meeting comes to order; apologies for absence, chairman's business, minutes and matters arising. There is an explanation given for an inevitable fact of publishing life; production delays. Then comes the first real business of the day.

"There was a call made at our last meeting", says editor-in-charge Malcolm Lewis, "for a set of teacher's notes to accompany the first bank of teaching materials. Now that we have got the materials together, we're in a position to provide these notes. I'm thinking here in terms of a handbook, perhaps, that would list the contents of the units, provide suggestions for use and for follow-up activities, offer guidance as to ways in which pathways through the material might be followed, and also suggest methods in which class activities—as opposed to independent learning activities—could be merged with some or all of the material."

The meeting collects its thoughts and starts kicking the idea around. "Yes", says someone, brooding aloud. "Yes, I'd like to know at a glance what kind of activities are involved in each unit. I've got some tape addicts in my class—unless I watch it, they're going to listen to tapes for a whole year, and not write anything." Obviously a teacher is speaking. But this is no lonely expert, imported to advise the decision makers on what schools want. Her colleagues round the table are teachers as well.

Malcolm Lewis also used to be a teacher; he is now on a four-year secondment. So is the concern's director, Philip Waterhouse. And the meeting's official observer, Geoff Hughes is a research fellow at Bristol University's School of Education.

The English editorial board of Avon's Resources for Learning Development Unit is in session. In a sense, the unit is to Avon what the media resources offices scheme is to the Inner London Education Authority. In both cases, the broad aim is the same: to help teachers to use learning resources in the most effective ways possible.

But the origins, content, and style of the help that Avon provides are very different. The media resources officer system, along with I.L.E.A.'s joint resources projects, is largely based on the thinking of Leslie Ryder, ILEA's staff inspector for learning resources. The parentage of the unit is more complex: Avon, the DES, and the Nuffield Foundation's research team on resources for learning have all played a part. (It was the Nuffield team who invited Avon to carry out a large-scale practical experiment resource-based learning. The ILEA system could best be described as a partnership between teachers and professional resources officers. Avon's schema, by contrast, is a near-autonomous cooperative run with the teachers, by the teachers, for the teachers. "There's a feeling of ownership", says Mr Waterhouse. "We, the seconded team at the unit, have often had to allow our own judgments to be set aside. The teachers must decide: this has been the idea right from the start".

Above all, the unit is in business to write materials. Actual resource production is an important part of ILEA's joint resources projects but here it is the heart of the matter.

Several hundred practitioners from Avon's classrooms (Mr Waterhouse has lost count of the exact number) are planning, researching, composing, collating and using resource packages in five large subject areas.

Resources include booklets, filmstrips, cassettes, tapes, games, and workshop activities. They are designed for lower secondary use, although teachers have successfully used the unit's materials with older pupils.

The subjects covered are English, mathematics, science, French and social studies. In mathematics there are symmetry, set theory, polygons, angles, area, number bases, algebra, statistics and more. In English, there are Henry Treece (Viking culture, and work-cards), newspapers, Beowulf, Theseus, the Mario Celeste (story booklet, worksheet, and captain's log, and city life (poems, picture cards and guidance sheet, cassette tape, tape worksheet).

The materials bank for French includes a charming short story about slugs. Les limaces aiment ça has a black and bulging heroine, gives ample practice in kitchen-garden vocabulary and, with a text only 239 words long, still contrives a surprise ending. Limaces looks deceptively simple. Still more deceptively simple are the guidance sheets that accompany, for example, the unit's social studies pack on hot deserts. "This", Guidance Sheet One says, "is what you have to do. First, collect a workbook and the resources; look at all the pictures and then make an attractive cover for your workbook; write on it the title . . . get an outline map of the world; mark and name all the hot deserts."

Extreme care has gone into preparing these step-by-step notes. "We are trying", Mr Waterhouse says, "to look at the whole business of guidance sheets, and at styles of learning that children recognize. Some children like making a workbook; that gives them security. Others prefer to roam free among the resources and find their own solutions to problems. And then, too, we want to think in terms of those who have a pictorial sense."

Early attempts at organized trail-laying of this kind were, he recalls, "a sweat". But writing guidance sheets that incorporated the proper amount of both precision and choice got easier as time went on. "I think that this is the sort of sophisticated thing that teachers ought to be learning", he goes on. "We're arguing that they ought to stop trying to write the Encyclopaedia Britannica and start worrying about making really effective guidance sheets to serve the resources they have in their schools."

An effective "trail" means that pupils can learn independently, at their own pace. The teacher, freed from answering what Mr Waterhouse calls quicklies ("Please, shall I put a title on my book?"), has time to develop a new, more personalized, and far more adult relationship with the taught. It is the exploration of this new teaching role, with the provision of the resources that underpin it, that is one of the unit's two main objectives. In effect, it is a practical evaluation of the nature of resource-based learning.

The other objective is also an evaluation, but the questions asked here are more specific. Both Avon and the country want to know whether an organization like this can perform a useful service to schools. If so, how should a local education authority set about establishing it?

The Bristol-based experiment has scarcely run for even half its four-year term. "It's not worth while dipping in the thermometer yet", says Mr Hughes, whose independent evaluation of the project is being paid for by the DES. Apart from anything else, not all the project's materials have yet been written, let alone put into circulation.

All the same, unofficial proofs that the unit is working positively do exist. There are three or four visitors a day, with out-of-county callers appearing two or three times a week. There are the attitudes of the ultimate classroom consumers. An anthology of childrens' views on resource-based learning, compiled by Mr Hughes and unit's staff, contains the following: "I shall miss it. I really looked forward to that lesson. It made you feel so free, so independent and you were allowed to talk about things to your neighbour. You had a choice on what you wanted to do. We could watch slides and listen to tapes which made it so much more interesting."

There are also sales. The unit's material is sold at near cost price, not given away. "We think it's a good thing that schools express their interest through the cheque book a little bit—not just take materials because they're free", Mr Waterhouse says. The result of this policy has been more than 8,000 orders this year—most of them within the county, some outside.

Most interesting of all, however, are the views of the authors' teachers themselves. Two point stand out: their increased sense of command over their subjects, and their newly acquired discrimination.

Graham wrote the unit's math material on angles. "It's a very, very strong discipline, having to write something that's virtually teacher-proof and pupil-proof", he says. "You have to see what can go wrong; you have to order your ideas and make sure." He feels that resource-based learning has a definite part to play in schools. "But a lot more work needs to be done on it. It's not a be-all and end-all. It's a good way of teaching but I'm not saying it's the ultimate."

Mike, a member of the English editorial board, emphasizes the group work is just as important as individual study. "The ultimate is child-based learning is a child teaching to himself." Lynne, also a member of the English team, is critical. "When I first started I was very worried about my work. Resource-based learning sounds like the answer. But I think it's be less enthusiastic about it now; I don't think that this kind of very private activity is the kind of thing I'd want in my classroom all the time."

"No", says someone else; "not all the time. But it makes an excellent extension to work."

Removing a stigma

by John A. Barker

War on Headlice
35mm full frame filmstrip £3.95. Also available as slide sets with cassettes. Teacher's notes 50p.
Camera Talks Ltd, 31 North Row, Park Lane, London W1R 2EN.

Headlice have declined steadily since the Second World War, but recently the trend has reversed. Complacency has had to give way to concern over the growing number of infested heads. In Britain today, one child in 50 may have headlice, and the total for the population may be one million. The body louse is also increasing and this is dangerous, for it carries typhus. Headlice do not transmit any serious disease but they are a source of irritation and discomfort.

This excellent filmstrip deals with the appearance, life-cycle, transmission and control of headlice. There are splendid photographs of nits and adult lice, though the latter might have benefited from a clear indication of scale, and by reference in the notes to the claws with which they cling to hair. A sequence of pictures shows identification of infestation and some secondary effects. Treatment is outlined, using clear photographs. The importance of education in helping to remove the stigma of itchy heads is emphasized.

This is a valuable filmstrip which could be useful over a wide age and ability range. The printed commentary is concise and provides a good basis for the discussion which the pictures should generate.

Play ideas for the handicapped

The Toy Libraries Association have produced a new booklet I Can Use My Hands, which gives information and suggestions on toys and play for handicapped children. As the title suggests, it is concerned with hand function and with upper limbs. The authors are Anne Richardson, of the Spastics Society, and Alison Wisbeach, of the Wolfson Centre, who are both occupational therapists and members of the association's advisory panel. I Can Use My Hands costs 40p, plus 10p for postage and packing, from The Toy Libraries Association, Sunley House, 10 Gunthorpe Street, London E1 7RW.

Strong images for an analysis of terror

Terrorism
Tape or cassette and filmstrip set, with teachers notes
Educational Audio Visual Ltd, Butterley St., Leeds LS10 1AX. £7.30

Many teachers must already feel that terrorism is an important topic to raise in class discussion. Others will have had the subject raised by pupils. In addition to the much-publicized armed liberation movements of the world we have our indigenous terrorists, bringing the cause of Northern Irish independence home in a way that English people cannot ignore.

The central question is one of definition. What is terrorism? Who decides if a particular act of violence is the work of "terrorists" or of "freedom fighters"? Are there any criteria which transcend one's own beliefs and sympathies—or is "terrorist" merely a term of abuse which adds nothing to understanding of a situation?

None of these questions is answered in this set. The producers limit themselves to offering a range of attitudes on the subject. The frames of the filmstrip, synchronised with the taped narration, are used not only to clarify the issues but also at times to muddy them. They show by contrasts the complexity of human existence swamping neat but abstract definitions. The intention is not to wrap the issue up, but to unpack it: to leave pupils with strong images to think about. It aims to shake us up, and to shake us out of some of the assumptions and prejudices surrounding this powerful issue.

Those responsible are to be congratulated on deciding to face such difficult and emotional questions so frankly. Any teacher who uses the set must expect it to generate a highly charged discussion—not without dangers, especially in an area with high Irish population. But this could be seen as a release of the pressures which the current random bombing inevitably creates. Pupils can use their own reactions to the real-life situation as material for analysing the nature of terror. Conversely, the generalization which this set encourages will help produce a clearer and more complex understanding of the IRA.

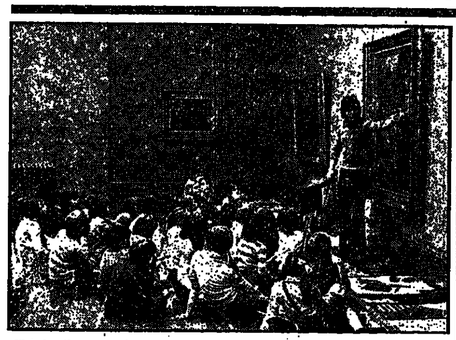
The presentation falls into four sections, of which the first two are unfortunately much better than the latter two. To begin questions of definition are posed: the basic "what is a terrorist?" building into a series of related questions, such as "what is the difference between terrorism and crime?" "what happens when atrocities are committed by those who make the law?" Violent events of several kinds—Hiroshima, Belsen, pub bombings, Geoffrey Jackson's kidnapping—are introduced and illustrated. The relative nature of the term is brought home by a series of paired polarities—terrorist/hero, gunman/partisan, statesman, dictator, agitator, revolutionary.

There follows a sample of definitions of "terrorism", taken from sources such as dictionaries, Che Guevara, the British Government (who weakly offer "the use of violence for political ends", a definition which includes any form of war), and so on. Here the illustrations are used in a more challenging way, sometimes complementing but sometimes jarring with the narration. The picture sources are wider, too: press cuttings, posters, cartoons, and paintings and etchings which underline the historical continuity of terrorism.

The next section is something of a disaster: a colourless pop song, composed especially for the set but of unclear relevance—indeed, of unclear meaning. The teacher's notes explain with the disarming innocence of a trendy vicar that "most young people seem much better equipped than many adults to appreciate pop lyrics and tunes". It may be that reactions to the song, and the fine twentieth-century paintings that accompany it, will "be very diverse and raise entirely new areas for consideration"; but the same might be said of any arbitrary inset.

The set ends with a short study of an incident in Belfast in 1972, a clash between Protestant and Catholic communities and their respective para-military organizations, with the British army an uneasy and finally unsuccessful referee. The intention is good and the example should produce interesting discussion, but the incident raises questions about inter-community tension and the nature of conflict rather than about terrorism per se. Many more directly relevant incidents might have been chosen.

All in all, the Terrorism set is to be recommended as good solid material, almost guaranteed to start an intense discussion in any class of 14 year olds or older. The teacher's notes include suggestions for further exploration of the issues.



Humberside school children at one of the Easter holiday art and mime workshops held in the Ferens Art Gallery, Hull. The sessions for seven-to-14-year-olds are conducted by Adrian Mitchell, visuals officer of the Cockpit Theatre and arts workshop of ILEA.

The children work in two rooms of the gallery painting scenes inspired by one of the gallery's pictures, usually chosen for its strong narrative content. The session finishes with small groups miming an episode suggested by their own paintings. The children's work will be left for a short period on the walls, alongside that of established artists such as William Scott and Alan Davie.

City built on matchsticks

Aspects of Roman Life Folder A. Longman Group Ltd, £4.75.

The folder comes in a tidy plastic wallet which takes up about the space of an average size hardback. Like much of the material produced by its publishers it is designed for use with other resources although it can be used alone. In this case the kit accompanies three books which deal more pictorially with the same topics: towns, houses, and family life. Two of the main aims of the kit's compiler are to give source material in translation and to provide workcards which ensure a variety of classroom activities. The kit is suitable for a maximum class of 36, although like most such kits, it is more flexible with smaller numbers.

The teachers' notes give three alternative methods for use which suggest that the course would have to be carefully planned. The classroom work is mainly directed by the workcards. There are 36 different topics. The questions are based on the 32 source sheets, most of which are composed of quotations from Roman writers. In addition, there are four sheets of photographs, four plans of villas or towns on one sheet and four outlines of model making. The workcards are carefully related to the source material and well thought out.

The kit shows great sensitivity to classroom needs. It is designed for cooperative work in pairs or small groups, and with the suggested books it can be used across the ability range. The books and pictorial material add a simple text to the more complicated readings in the kit. Although the publishers do not suggest a suitable age group the kit seems best fitted for middle or junior secondary students. It could be used in any integrated humanities course as well as history, classical studies or background to Latin. Some of the material would go well in geography or social studies courses which include sections on town planning or the family.

The material is original and fresh. The crowded, urban life of Rome is depicted in vivid translations from Juvenal, Martial and Petronius, as well as more familiar textbook sources such as Pliny and Vitruvius. The material provided answers Juvenal's question: "Why are so many people prepared to live in this abysmal god-forsaken hole with all its terrors—fires, buildings constantly collapsing and a thousand other dangers?" He points out that: "We live in a city that's propped up with little more than matchsticks."

Almost all Romans, apart from the lucky ones with country properties such as Pliny in his "little" villa, were constantly preoccupied with the dangers, hazards and excitements of life in the city.

"You have to pay the earth for a pokey garret, keeping a slave is an expensive business and even a modest supper costs a fortune." A complaint which sounds remarkably similar to Punch of the 1930s, bemoaning the servant problem.

Unfortunately the sources for discussing slavery are not arranged carefully enough to make the concept easy to understand. One quotation is quite chilling: "Men work more willingly if they get better treatment and larger rations . . . or some special concessions." Surprisingly the quotations on family life show a legal situation in which children and wives were property like slaves but a practical expectation that they would behave as they pleased. As well there are descriptions of people, places and things and several of events, notably the burning of Rome and the eruption of Vesuvius.

The tasks set for students are well fitted to the material, and all questions can be answered from the kit. There could easily be a term's work here, more if the kit were used only in history lessons. At the end of it a student would have a thorough understanding of the topics covered.

Chanting the mass

New Chants for the Mass is a cassette and music card from the Catholic Truth Society. It is designed to introduce priests and people to the new chants as they are in the English edition of the Roman missal.

The cassette is introduced by Father Agnellus Andrew, OFM. Side one demonstrates the parts of the Mass which involve the congregation in singing or making responses. Side two demonstrates the priest's part.

The cassette costs £2.16 and the cards, 15p each, from the Catholic Truth Society, 38/40 Eccleston Square, London SW1V 1PD. There are also CTS branches in Birmingham, Cardiff, Liverpool, Manchester and Newcastle upon Tyne.

Library courses

Loughborough University of Technology's Library and Information Studies Department is offering four residential courses in July. The courses run for one week each, during the fortnight of July 18-31. Their titles are: "Cataloguing, Classification and Computers"; "Management Innovations" (both during the first week); "Current Reference and Information Work"; and "Computers and Indexing" in the second. The fee for each course is £66, which includes full residence. Further information from Mrs Sheila Hulland, Department of Library and Information Studies, University of Technology, Loughborough, Leicestershire, LE11 3TU.

WALTHAM FOREST
London Borough of EDUCATIONAL VISITORS
It is proposed to appoint EDUCATIONAL VISITORS for work with physical children from September, 1976, to join an existing team.

The main task of educational visitors is to foster the partnership between home and school in all its aspects and to help parents understand the aims of education. The work involves visiting pre-school groups in their own homes to extend their experience through play leader, parents in this way it is hoped that parents will gain an insight into how children learn and an understanding of a child's life at school. Contact with neighbourhood nursery groups will be important as the persons appointed may be attached to nursery units and will play an important part in assessing and to appreciate the nature the complementary learning of the child outside school.
Applicants should preferably be qualified nursery school teachers with good teaching experience. Applications will also be welcomed from teachers with relevant experience in other fields of education, experience of voluntary community work, or social work. Wallet not essential, may be an advantage.
Salary will be in accordance with Scale II, London Allowance £207 payable.

HILLFIELDS NURSERY CENTRE
Clifton Street, Coventry

Deputy Head Teacher

Applications are invited for the above post, salary for which is in accordance with the Burnham Scale, Group 3, plus £140 Responsibility Allowance and Social Priority Allowance (£201-£276).
The Nursery Centre was built as part of the Urban Aid Programme and opened in 1971. It is situated in an inner city area, and is attempting to meet the needs of very young children and their parents within this area. The Centre opens from 7.00 a.m.-6.00 p.m. for 48 weeks of the year, and is staffed accordingly.
The post of Deputy Head Teacher is both challenging and rewarding. It involves taking working hours and holidays on a staggered basis although total hours of work and holiday entitlement remain the equivalent of teachers in ordinary schools. The person appointed will be mainly responsible for the smooth running of the area in which the 3-4 year olds work, as well as links with parents and the local community.
Further particulars and application forms from Director of Education, Council Offices, Earl Street, Coventry CV1 5RS (telephone 0203 25555, ext. 2445) to be returned by 19 May, 1976.

ART, CRAFTS AND DESIGN

TWO WORLDS

Bernard Denvir on the transition between secondary and higher education in art and design

Although the notion that art and design education is the Cinderella of the secondary section of the educational world is no longer as valid as it once was, it would be ridiculously optimistic to suggest that the situation is at all happy. The ugly sisters of suspicion and incomprehension still natter away; the glass slipper is as ineluctable as ever, and nobody is quite sure who the prince is.

But nowhere in the educational world is the transition between secondary and higher education more bedevilled with problems, ambiguities and latent antagonisms than in art and design.

The reasons for this are complex and various: some institutional, some psychological, some accidental. The most obvious is the basic difference between those disciplines such as science or the humanities, which are not only basically intellectual in content, but also offer a clearly defined career future, and one which depends on a variable degree of manual dexterity allied to the enigmatic imponderability of "creativity", and which presents a far less clearly defined economic future to those who undertake it.

The extent to which art and design teaching is available in schools depends not only on particular traditions and attitudes, but on the size and type of school. In almost all the emphasis is largely on subjects which lead somewhere, in the more obvious sense of the phrase. There tends, therefore, to be a basic lack of continuity throughout a student's career when he or she opts for art and design as a subject for post-sixth-form study.

The historian, the scientist or the technologist who goes up to university or polytechnic will take with him a more or less integrated body of information and a set of skills which have been developing consistently since primary level, and which will form the foundation on which his undergraduate studies will be based. He will have been taught them continuously, and mostly by teachers whose academic careers have been similar to that for which he has opted, and among whom there will be a general consensus of opinion about the nature of their discipline. In art and design, however, a different situation prevails.

The very distinction between "art" and "design" is significant. Contrary to common belief, painting and sculpture form only part, and in many cases a small part, of the total curriculum of most art colleges. Three-dimensional design, graphics, fashion, textiles, and a range of specialized aspects of all these studies attract great numbers of students, whose previous experience of these activities has been at best minimal—despite recent attempts to improve—or even create—design teaching at secondary level.

The provision for fine art in schools is more consistent, and has a longer history, but here problems of a different kind occur. The nature and purpose of art are today the subject of debate to a degree unknown before in the history of western civilization.

There are none of the approximate certainties which give other areas of study a coherence of their own, and though it may well be that at secondary level pupils will have been led to believe certain assumptions about the nature of painting, drawing and sculpture, it is more than likely that when they make the transition to art college they will have to abandon them completely.

They will find no line of continuity to lead them from the art classes of the fifth form to a degree in fine art, and hopefully to a stint at the Royal College or some other postgraduate institution, in the same way, for instance, that a historian, even at doctorate level can still draw on intellectual capital which he has been acquiring since primary school.

This is compounded by the fact that at adolescence the spontaneous visual creativity inherited from childhood is replaced by something more deliberate, more self-conscious, and, in most cases, something more difficult to manipulate in a positive way.

Less easy to define, but of cardinal importance in any consideration of the differences between art and design teaching at secondary and graduate levels, is a certain tension between teachers in the two sectors, which can range from lack of mutual understanding to downright hostility.

Once again the reasons for this are complex, involving both status (real or imagined) and attitudes towards the subject taught. Although an increasing number of art teachers have had a Diploma in Art and Design background, followed by an Art Teacher's Diploma there is a still larger number whose qualifications consist either of a Teaching Certificate or a National Diploma in Design.

In art colleges, on the other hand, most of the senior staff have Royal College of Art qualifications — or their equivalent—and, even more significantly, the tutors on the studio floor with whom students come into closest contact, usually work on a part-time basis. This means that, unlike most of their contemporaries at secondary level, they are still fairly heavily involved in the practice of their profession. As artists, therefore, they will be orientated towards the ideals of Bond Street and the Arts Council circuit; as designers they are often self-employed.

In either case, their sights are more sharply fixed on the immediate present, and whereas with teachers in other disciplines this would involve nothing more than an awareness of current research, in the field of art and design, it can involve a basic disagreement about the actual nature of the subject taught. This state of affairs lends to breed a certain suspicion and fear on the one side; a degree of intolerant condescension on the other.

The situation has been still further exacerbated by historical factors. The old National Diploma in Design was much more organically connected with the secondary sector than the Diploma in Art and Design, which commenced its career in 1963, and which greatly enhanced the educational status of those colleges which were permitted to confer it. Higher art education became academically respectable, and ambitious, the process being still further emphasised by the translation of the diploma into a degree, when the National Council for Diplomas in Art and Design was amalgamated with the Council for National Academic Awards.

Although this made little real difference to the nature of the courses offered, it is undeniable that a degree often suggests to those who do not possess one, a distinction unknown to those who do.

More recently the emphasis given to the notion of direct entry from sixth forms into degree courses in art and design, without the necessity of experiencing what to most teachers in higher education would seem to be the essential foundation year, has stirred up new rivalries between the two sectors, and often brought art colleges into direct competition with schools which are developing their art and design departments.

The whole position was significantly, though perhaps unfairly, underlined by a headline in the TES (March 26) "Art colleges get their perspective all wrong" which introduced an account of a seminar organized jointly by the National Society for Art Education and the National Association of Teachers in Further and Higher Education, at which many of the problems and grievances inherent in the present relation of secondary to higher art and design education were discussed.

The trouble is that although the problem could once be sidestepped, the current amalgamation of colleges of education with art colleges makes this no longer possible. Perhaps salvation lies this way.

Bernard Denvir is principal lecturer in art history at Ravensbourne College of Art and Design and member of the committee of art and design, CNAA. He is author of "Impressionism" and "Fauvism and Expressionism".

ART IN THE CARING PROFESSIONS

By Joyce Laing, chairman of the Scottish Society of Art and Psychotherapy

The early hopes of the mid-century that the sciences would answer all our ills have brought disillusionment, even at a time when technology has never advanced so fast or brought so any advantages. Now there are signs in our social climate of a rebirth of the arts, of people's awareness that the whole person can never depend solely on mechanicol or chemical aids and that the inner self is a necessary part of us all.

Many hospitals, institutions, training centres, special schools, borstals, who are concerned with caring for people, are seeking the imagination, inventiveness and skills of the artist in an effort to revitalise their own effectiveness.

The artist, who is also trained as a therapist, can play a vital role in the psychiatric team of a hospital or in the caring staff of a residential institution. The art productions by patients can be used in the diagnosis of the changing moods and states of mind and can also be of value in a skilled psychotherapeutic treatment programme.

From the environmental aspect, an artist in a hospital or community can enrich the living experience. To date a number of artists have contributed to certain situations by designing playgrounds and inventing toys for handicapped children, by choosing aesthetically selected colour schemes for wards, waiting-rooms and surgeries or by designing art forms specifically for areas within the hospital and by creating art objects to encourage the disabled, the long-term or elderly patient to participate themselves in creativity.

Obviously working with the disabled calls for special skills not encompassed in art college training and only peripherally touched upon in colleges of education. There is need for a new concept of training for the artist who will eventually become also a therapist or an artist to a caring community.

At present in England there are three courses concerned with art therapy. At Birmingham School of Art Education there is a one-year postgraduate course for artists, who already have at least three years' work experience, for an MA degree in art education.

Goldsmiths' College of Art offer a one-year postgraduate Diploma in Art Education in which art therapy may be a selected option. St Alban's College of Art offer a one-year course in art therapy but do not specify any essential entry qualifications.

While many of the students possess the National Diploma in Design, non-artists may also apply for this course. It is, perhaps, therefore not surprising that the administrators of career and salary structures find it difficult to describe or place art therapists.

It is about 20 years since art therapy was introduced to Britain; its origins in the United States came later, yet today five universities in the United States offer MA degree courses in art therapy.

Psychiatrists, heads of residential institutions and governors of prisons are not seeking artists to be pseudo-psychologists or pseudo-social workers, but want artists whose own professional skills can add to the therapeutic programme of their communities.

It is, therefore, logical that any training in art therapy should have the basic support of an art college and that the artist-graduate should gain his specialized knowledge under the guidance of a department of mental health. Such a course needs the theory of behavioural development and of psychological disturbance, it needs the clinical practice of hospital or residential care settings and it needs the opportunity for the artist to return frequently to his artistic base in the art college where he can develop his own ideas and further research in his studies. Above all he must continue to grow as an artist.

Today Scotland has a wealth of artist-graduates whose concern in caring for others is complementary to their philosophy of their art. These artists have already received four to six years' training—surely an investment from which the country must look now for return. Should the graduate artist wish to offer his skills to the educational system there is provision for engaging him: but should he or she choose to try to help the handicapped, the sick, the deprived or disabled there is no way for them to enter these situations in their own right as artists.

Scotland has always jealously guarded her standards of professionalism, but sadly this striving for the highest quality has led to delays in effecting many of her far-sighted ideas. The present position is a wasteful anomaly. There is a need for, and many requests for, the skills of artist-therapists. There are artists who are keen and able to undertake such a commitment.

As yet there is no way to bring the two together. Professional facilities exist in every teaching hospital: it would take organization to develop a meaningful course but little financial cost. The resulting course would have a realistic career structure and offer opportunities for the artist working as a therapist to return to an educational post should he wish and for the art teacher to train to work in the caring professions. It must be hoped that soon Scotland will take the initiative and organize a training course which will be credible to all professions.

In other ways Scotland has forged ahead with links between the arts and the community. Five years ago the Scottish Society of Art and Psychotherapy was formed with the aim of bringing together a multi-disciplinary group of artists, psychiatrists, psychologists and social workers and educationists to further the uses of the arts in the caring professions.

The society meets monthly in the academic year and covers a diverse range of interests from analytical studies of art to viewing the work of the artist to the town. It is a recognized branch of the Societé internationale de Psychopathologie de l'Expression which is based in Paris.

There are a number of lively art therapy departments in Scotland, and although mostly having to be run on a part-time basis because of administrative difficulties, there is emerging an interesting collection of art-productions from hospitals and special schools. Indeed the purely aesthetic merit of some of these art-productions has resulted in the present collecting of material for the largest exhibition ever to be held in the United Kingdom of this art form.

In August this year the Third Eye Centre, Glasgow, with the support of the Scottish Arts Council will hold an exhibition to be called Art Extraordinary. This exhibition will also include some of the art work from the now famous continental collections which date back as far as the Hans Prinzhorn collection housed at the beginning of the century in Heidelberg.

CONCERNED TO HELP

Peter Ewence on Don Caston's work for handicapped

Last week a 12-week course began at the City of London Polytechnic for the parents and teachers of handicapped children. It is not devoted to the problems of coping with handicapped children or concerned with an analysis of the causes of handicap. It is solely concerned with making toys, games and educational aids for the whole range of handicap, using simple tools, basic materials and uncomplicated methods.

The organizer and course leader, Mr Don Caston, a lecturer at the City of London Polytechnic School of Art, has been attached to the Inner London Education Authority's art and special school inspectorates for the past three years. During that time, he has observed handicapped children firsthand in the classroom and, as a result, developed a range of devices to make the education of the child a happier experience for all concerned.

The key to the devices which Don Caston has been perfecting is cheapness and ease of construction. "This is what I call the twopenny-halfpenny end of the research market. There are no PhDs for the asking here. None of this stuff is glamorous or expensive. But it works and I've had no complaints yet."

The range of equipment he has developed is comprehensive, with a simple philosophy behind it all. Whenever he encounters a new problem, he sits down to design something that will help to overcome it.

For example, he noticed that some children, due to muscular or arthritic problems, were unable to grip and hold steady something as small and awkward as a pencil or a paintbrush or even a spoon. He returned to his workshop and a few weeks later had perfected a technique for the manufacture of personalized hand grips which was inexpensive and pliable. The child grips a lump of clay (as hard as the strength of the grip will permit) with a pencil in it at the correct angle for comfortable writing. The impression is then hardened to become a mould.

If the child cannot speak, he casts a grip from clear resin and, when the child is holding the grip, shines a torch along the barrel where the pencil-brush would fit and can see where the hold is correct and where it needs alteration. This established, the final product is made from water-extended polyester—a material which is cheap and easy to use and at the same time, virtually indestructible.

Among the other devices he has designed is one which he calls "the activity tray system". The basis of this is a small wooden tray, specially designed to incorporate an activity such as writing (using pocket-book size blackboards with the letters printed in white at the top) or potato-cut printing or jewelry manufacture. Everything needed for the activity is available on the tray and there is a trolley to hold up to a dozen of these activities at a time.

The idea for this system came, like all the others, from observation in the classroom. But this time it was observing the teacher rather than the child. "If you've set up a child to paint you've had to get the drawing board, the paper, the brushes and the water usually from separate sources. What happens when the child gets bored? You've got to clear it all away and set something else up. Most of that problem by even 10, or mind 20, and the teacher ends running about dolling out and ta ing up and not being able to concentrate on teaching. It seemed me that if you could have a thing set up beforehand cleared up afterwards you get on with the important t teaching the kids."

These and other devices such a lightweight drawing board quarter of the weight of a stan board but with the same str and strength), dexterity toys cially designed building bricks 3D "noughts and crosses" or a penny", for instance) and protective clothing made from latest plastics are all included the range of devices that parents and teachers can make themselves at minimum cos Don Caston's workshop at the technic's school of art.

"All the gear they can make been tested in the schools as all works. Even the workshop been specially equipped with and simple domestic power t that those on the course, if they're all fingers and th will be able to make the stuff they won't be frightened of c off their fingers as they wou the machinery was industrial not domestic."

Before joining the City of don Polytechnic in 1971, Don had been an art teacher Stamford House Remand Sch and Exmouth Comprehen Before that he had been in plastics industry as a tex designer. He still accepts the sional commission from ind to keep his hand in and keep with new developments materials", and through this in trial contact he has been able experiment with the materials before they are com cially available.

At the time of writing he the United States at the invita of the New York Teachers Au ority and the United Cerebral Pals in New York. While America he will be meeting directors of the New Engl Medical Centre, at Tufts Uni sity, Boston, and the departme special education at Colu University, to exchange notes.

He was last in America August last year and has been vited back to appear on nati television to talk about his w and confer with United St Department of Education offic on their plans for the educatio the handicapped. After the co has finished he will be flying Israel to represent the H.E.A. at world conference on handicap provision to be held there a month.

To the best of his knowledge, is, at present, the only per working on these practical a cheap aids for the handicap child in this country, if not t world. If this course is a succe then the way is clear for the est lishment of more of these cour using existing workshops, throug out the United Kingdom. "Th object of the exercise is to h the parents and teachers of han capped children to make for th selves the toys and devices wh will go some of the way towar making those children happier a more equal—less "disadvantaged"

THE RENAISSANCE OF THE ARTIST CRAFTSMAN

By Dr Roy Strong, director of the Victoria and Albert Museum

It is rare for the Victoria and Albert Museum to have to close its doors for anything other than a bomb scare these days, but on Friday, January 2, we did. The reason was simple if unusual. There was just no room for any more visitors to be packed into that vast 12-acre site.

About 17,000 people poured through the museum that day and even our crow's nest, the ceramics galleries, hustled with life. Pandemonium was let loose. Whole families, up for the day from the suburbs and regions, seemed to arrive in battle formation. It was wonderful, it was exhilarating, it was a triumph and it was evoked by a single event, The Makers.

For the first time in the museum's history 11 artist craftsmen of today had moved their workshops in lock, stock and barrel, and settled down to work for a week in our galleries. Tapestry was woven in the tapestry courts, books were bound outside the library, embroidery was stitched in proximity to the opus anglicanum and so on. The continuity of the past into the present was comprehended at a glance.

Ever since I became director of the Victoria and Albert in 1974 it has been a central thread of policy that the museum should actively associate itself with the whole spectrum of contemporary creativity in the decorative arts, and in particular the renaissance of the artist craftsman.

To me, as an historian, one must always go back to go forward. The Victoria and Albert was the world's first museum of the decorative and applied arts and its creation was directly stimulated to counter the fall in standards produced by mid-nineteenth century industrialization.

Up to the close of the last century it was the vanguard of all contemporary movements in the arts. But suddenly it began to freeze. At the turn of the century the curators seemed to lose their nerve about the present and there arose that terrifying cult of the sanctity of the posthumous pronouncement.

So the emphasis shifted heavily in two directions, both equally valid and neither exclusive of the other. The first conceived the museum as the athenaeum of the antiquarian, sorting, codifying, exhuming and categorising the artifacts of the past; the other was borne of the emergence of art history as a subject and the apotheosis of art as a history of style. For them the museum was above all the shrine of the masterpiece and a place in which the curators occupied roles somewhat akin to Counter Reformation clergy exposing relics for veneration by the faithful.

A museum is and must be a pliable vehicle to expound from its collections what is relevant for the moment, and the time has now come to tilt the balance back a little and to re-state in today's language its original brief.

The V & A should play a vital role in the revival and reintegration of the crafts back into the mainstream of aesthetic creativity and into the community as a whole. We can, in the first place, offer the crafts a shop window and an arena for activity. In 1974 the Crafts Advisory Council opened their first small but exquisitely designed shop in the museum, selling the best of artifacts by our contemporary craftsmen, jewellery, ceramics, glass, silver, and textiles. This has been a great success, giving to artists a means of selling their wares, providing the public a way of purchase devoid of the intimidating mystique of the commercial galleries.

Second, we will be emphasizing as never before in the next few years the artifacts of the present century. The great curatorial departments, nearly all constituted on their present lines in 1909 and most of whose collections ground to a halt in the early years of this century, are being given special funds to purchase work made after 1920 with an accent on the contemporary. We will follow this theme through in the creation of a Twentieth Century Primary Gallery and in our temporary exhibition programmes.

Most important of all, our experiment of the public meeting the artist craftsman must be repeated again and again. The permutations of this are endless. In June we will be experimenting by taking the initial idea a stage further, but this time in depth. The department of metalwork embraces everything from the Armada Jewel to iron balustrading, and it is this spectrum in the making which we shall attempt to conjure up.

In the quadrangle, that blessed but under-used spot, there will be a foundry (no blacksmith in the interests of our library rendeve up above !) in which molten metal will be poured into both historic and contemporary moulds. Inside the museum, in our metalwork galleries, craftsmen silversmiths and jewellers will once more be working. Films on the historic processes will be shown in the lecture theatre and there will be complementary lectures and literature.

We must also discover how we can take things like this out on the road via our new department of education and regional services. Time and again in letters from the regions there was a demand for exhibitions based on the Makers concept. When the new department shortly becomes a reality this will be a central tenet in their brief for the regions.

We must also take stock as to how, in the long run, the marvellous revival and incipient public enthusiasm and support for the crafts should affect our permanent display. It will almost certainly mean a redevelopment of our Primary Galleries, with their period rooms and chic tableaux, a little less contemplation of the object in abstract and a little more accent on practicalities.

We are already meeting the demand for the sociological approach to our artifacts, but we are only beginning to stir ourselves on the actual process of manufacture. Gradually we must develop technical displays on production and this new emphasis must be reflected in our educational programmes. Already we run a needlework course based on an intensive study of the stitches and methods used on objects available for study in our textile study room.

Similar but shorter study courses are held, for instance, on the process of reproduction with visits to the Royal College of Art and work in our print room as part of them. One would be interested to know how much, for instance, our ceramics galleries were used by those actually studying ceramic design and manufacture. Looking at the available range of kitchen and bathroom tiles in this country for a start reveals the abysmal level we have sunk to. For far too long art schools have despised the study of the past and its techniques of design and manufacture.

At its best the museum should aim to be a forum for contemporary creativity in the decorative arts. All the world's leading designers and craftsmen should be represented and seen in its collections, highlighted from time to time in temporary exhibitions. Above all, we should be in the vanguard of restoring the decorative arts back to their sister, architecture, who has shamefully for most of this century hacked every piece of ornamentation from herself as if the very idea of decoration was tainted.

Ornament has virtually become a dirty word. There is no modern vocabulary for ornament, but why should not there be? We are at last in revolt against the barren office block, all glass and concrete, with its solitary Henry Moore marooned before it as the only gesture of art. We loathe the blank unadorned living units created by the dreary architects of the welfare state devoid of even a solitary exotic excrescence.

Architects and planners should, as they did in the past, coordinate the skills and creativity of others. Any major contemporary public building should sing out, not with a single statue, but incorporate specially designed textiles, tapestry, embroidered hangings, carpets, metalwork, stained glass, furniture, decorative painting and plasterwork. The fault here lies not only with the architects and their clients, but with the baleful influence of the antiques arcade interior decorators whose passion for cluttering us forever with the past, however ghastly, is eroding our will to look forward.

Strange as it may seem the museum should have as one of its objectives to inspire its visitors into wishing to surround themselves with the best of today and to make them realize that their patronage, however small in that direction, is not only creating new art but giving a livelihood and a direction to the artist craftsman in the abused world of the decorative arts.

REALLY WELCOME

Peter MacKarell reviews papers produced by the Association of Art Advisers

The Association of Art Advisers is a fairly new body, and it is very much to its members' credit that so soon after formation they should set about publishing The Function of Art Education in Secondary Schools: papers which reveal their professional concern and point to areas they wish to investigate.

As advisers they have the tasks of the working diplomat in dealing with administrators on behalf of schools. This basic setting out is complicated by the fact that art advisers have a subject allegiance, so they act as advocates and do battle in the grey corridors for teachers whose convictions they admire. They also try to provide improved technical and material resources for schools. For the young teacher particularly, a lively working and subject committed art adviser can provide effective and welcome support.

It is a pleasant duty then to greet an association of potential and influences, and to see in a little more detail the areas they have selected for scrutiny. They begin with a prose poem and end with a school syllabus, which is fair enough, while in between some of the contributors spar with The Big One.

Artists, art historians, art teachers, those who train art teachers, critics, even politicians and others with time on their hands have squared up to the question "What is Art?" Many have found it difficult. Not many answers are as jarring as that of Myles na Gopaleen, "But the main thing to bear in mind is the unimportance of all art. It is very much a minority activity."

Ernest Goodman has a long piece about curriculum justification, in which he projects a fundamentally important area called "aesthetic studies" while launching a few round-house swipes at other subject areas. He is uneasy about the more competitive aspects of physical education, but he left me uneasy about how his projected scheme was ever going to exist in the face of likely competition from other subject interests.

It was not really a surprise that the answers to "What is Art?" should emerge as "We don't know, but we are convinced it is important", nor was it a surprise, to go back to Myles na Gopaleen for a moment, that nobody reproduced the question he asked in one of his famous Cruiskeen Lawn columns "What prompts a sane to offensive man to write?"

The advisers are surely sane, to offensive men, but the simple explanation for the fact they have produced these papers is probably that, in their case, they wished to mark out and identify some common ground, for art is a subject area in which teachers use varying method with disparate intention for differ ent results. It is even a possibility that the conviction that common ground can be mapped out is not taken.

However, the chill winds of economic reality have blown away the fog and revealed some strong features, so the advisers are right to see in what ways they can make their considerable influence tell. Indeed, one looks forward to papers devoted to the practical ways in which they can help teachers, individually, pastorally, in art centres, on special courses, in fighting for more in-service training places and by contact with institutions of professional training.

Of the individual contributions here, Maurice Barratt presents a rough-hewn but useful and realistic overview of six rationales for art teaching, Robert Clement offers a chronologically based look at the conventional expectation of children's art work, but David Aspin concludes his paper on the function of art education with an exhortation to "get the jackets off". Yes—one can applaud this—for art work is about practice, and that which sparks off and maintains activity in teachers and taught, as well as among the advisors themselves, is really welcome.

STRATEGIES FOR THE FUTURE

The Royal College of Art report on design in general education summarized by Ken Baynes

It is now two and a half years since work began at the Royal College of Art on a project with the title "Design in general education". Since then we have been able to make regular reports on progress in the TES and many teachers in various parts of the country have participated directly in our work. As a result, the general pattern of our findings and recommendations is reasonably well known. It will come as no surprise to those who have attended our conferences and discussions to learn that we believe that design, in the broadest sense, should be a core element in the secondary curriculum; that we are convinced that the proper medium for its development is local curriculum development work carried out by teachers; and that we would welcome the emergence of different ways of providing design education in comprehensive schools. What may surprise some teachers and administrators is the radical nature of our proposals.

When our report goes to the Department of Education and Science this month it will emphasize the contrast between achievement and potential in design education. We have an immense resource of human and physical skill and material in school workshops and studios. For years every major report on education has acknowledged the importance of arts and crafts as an experience and some have recognized that practical learning is often more effective than theoretical learning.

For all that, and particularly at school level, not enough has been done. We believe that teachers of design can prove the worth of their subject only if they are given effective support.

The study has been concerned with the definition of strategies for the future of design in general education. The team will specify the changes which it hopes to see brought about. It is argued that, in order to raise the level of design awareness and to establish design as a core area in general education, certain specific developments will be required. In the broadest terms, these are as follows:

- An acceptance of the importance of design as an aspect of national policy in relation to economics, industry, planning and culture.
- An improvement in the philosophical and theoretical basis for design education.
- A greater understanding of the way in which design awareness can, in practice, be encouraged in schools by design and other activities.
- A wider experience of design among teachers and educationists at all levels.
- A wider knowledge of the various forms of school organization which can support the development of design awareness and of the advantages and problems associated with them.
- The establishment of machinery, at all levels of education, which will enable subject specialists to come together to discover what common ground exists between them in relation to design studies.
- The design of a series of examinations linking secondary with tertiary education and which support educational improvement and provide an appropriate basis for general as well as specialist education.

Clearly there is not space here to deal with all these points. I have therefore devoted the rest of this article to a discussion of the kind of proposals that may be put forward in relation to examinations.

Examinations are a vast area for future development. Success in this undertaking would draw together all the other strands in the proposals and have an immediate and direct impact on the work done in schools. Speed of action is called for because big structural changes in the examination system are under discussion and will happen soon. But the problems in relation to art, design and craft are formidable. The fragmentation of responsibility makes coherent change hard to achieve. There is little agreement on aims and objectives between the secondary and tertiary levels, and there is much doubt about appropriate criteria and the validity of the various methods of assessment.

It is important that the interim nature of the present stage should be recognized. The need is for continuing and careful development for a period of 10 to 15 years. Among other things a start needs to be made at creating better links between secondary and tertiary education. Once established, these links would allow for a consideration of the data coming from any theoretical research work. This would lead to an assessment of what could constitute a common core of experience to be shared between general and specialist education. Agreement on such an assessment appears to be required before any long-term plans can be evaluated with any degree of realism. It will be useful if, in parallel with these developments, there is fundamental research into the whole problem of assessment criteria and procedures in art, design and craft examinations.

It is of very greatest importance that university and CSE boards involved in any way with design studies should enlarge the number of people on their committees and among their examiners who have experience of design and design education.

This is not only a matter of examinations which happen to have "design" in their title: it applies to any examination with an element of design activity or awareness.

It is hoped that, in looking at examination proposals the Schools Council and the examining boards will recognize the aspirations of design to become a core element in the curriculum. We do not want further fragmentation of studies within the area of art, craft, handicraft, home economics and environmental and technical studies. We believe that the pattern emerging in the Oxford A level and in the thinking of the council's own N and F working party on design is extremely promising. In both cases, we have in view a major and demanding examination with clearly defined basic principles of content and performance which can, none the less, be taken through the medium of a degree of subject specialization. Both have practical work as a major element. Both could be developed to accommodate work as diverse as fashion design and control technology. This kind of exa-

It's amazing how many people assume Winsor & Newton art materials are expensive just because they're the best.

A debt to the 19th century
Mr. Winsor and Mr. Newton began as artists' colourmen, compounding paints for the great English painters of the 19th century. Quality was everything. Beautiful and durable colours that could be handled in subtle ways, giving the artist complete control over the medium.

Winton Oil Paints

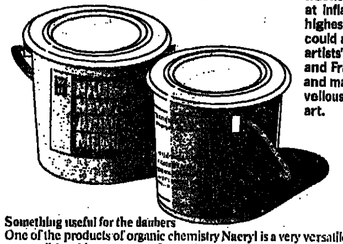
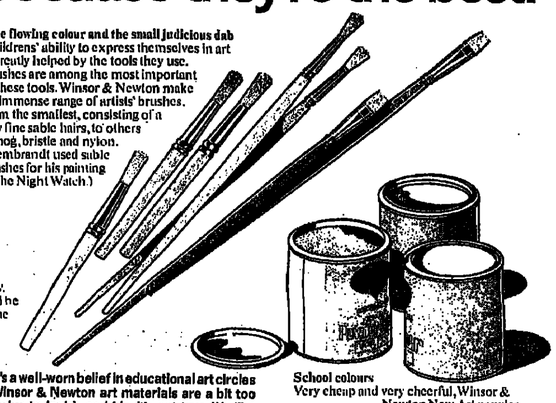
Cotman's legacy
Artists generally agree that John Cotman was one of the greatest water colourists of landscape in the 19th century. With pride we use his name for a range of beautiful transparent water colours, all at the same price regardless of the cost of production.



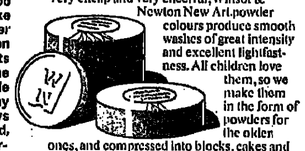
Something useful for the daubers
One of the products of organic chemistry Nacryl is a very versatile paste compatible with every type of water based paint. You can mix it in any proportion with powder colours, tube water colours, gouache, poster colours and drawing inks to produce very free flowing or very dense colour, which is exceptionally adhesive and waterproof. It is ideal for collage work or for large murals.

Free flowing colour and the small judicious dab
Childrens' ability to express themselves in art is greatly helped by the tools they use. Brushes are among the most important of these tools. Winsor & Newton make an immense range of artists' brushes, from the smallest, consisting of a few fine sable hairs, to others of hog, bristle and nylon. (Rembrandt used sable brushes for his painting of the Night Watch.)

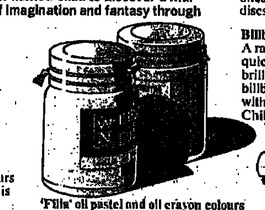


There's a well-worn belief in educational art circles that Winsor & Newton art materials are a bit too expensive to lavish on kids. It's not true. We like the reputation for quality that we've built up over the last hundred and forty years. This reputation was not founded on selling materials to rich artists at inflated prices. It was built on supplying the highest quality materials at prices ordinary people could afford. So here are just a few of the many artists' materials that help the David Hockneys and Francis Bacons of tomorrow to get started, and many an un-named child to discover a marvellous world of imagination and fantasy through art.

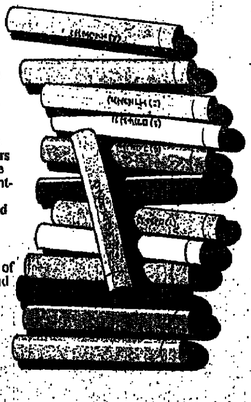
School colours
Very cheap and very cheerful, Winsor & Newton New Art powder colours produce smooth washes of great intensity and excellent lightfastness. All children love them, so we make them in the form of powders for the older ones, and compressed into blocks, cakes and discs for the younger.



Billboard art
A range of forty poster colours which dry quickly and evenly, with a matt surface of fine brilliance. A lot of the original artwork for billboards and showcards in Britain is done with Winsor & Newton Poster Colours. Children love using them.



'Filia' oil pastel and oil crayon colours
A range of pastels, and crayons which are of slightly firmer consistency and therefore suitable for younger pupils. 'Filia' allows children to experiment successfully and inexpensively with colour drawing. They can experience the excitement of blending the colours with turpentine and thereby reach the first stage of oil painting. They are lightfast, free-blending and the crayons don't smudge – even the smallest child can't spoil his picture.



Drawing with pen and brush
Especially for schools, jumbo-sized bottles of our drawing inks in a range of twenty colours. All contain shellac and this enables one colour to be easily superimposed on another.

Winsor & Newton

mination could support a variety of developments in schools while being nationally recognised as representing a worthwhile and, eventually, essential educational experience. It should receive further support.

In connexion with the future development of the examination system, it may be proposed that the Design Council should play a leading role in bringing together industry, designers and teachers. We hope eventually to see a resolution of the conflicts between general and specialist education in design. The ideal would be to develop a unity of purpose between schools, industry and the design professions. Eventually, the entry requirements for professional institutions in engineering, planning and architecture and art and design, universities, polytechnics and colleges of higher education, technical colleges and industrial apprenticeships should support the development of design education at school level and make the passing of a suitable design examination an entry requirement to stand beside English and mathematics. The medium for this rapprochment should be an annual conference and related working groups which would represent existing forums such as the Standing Conference for School Technology and relate them in this particular aspect of development to design education as a whole.

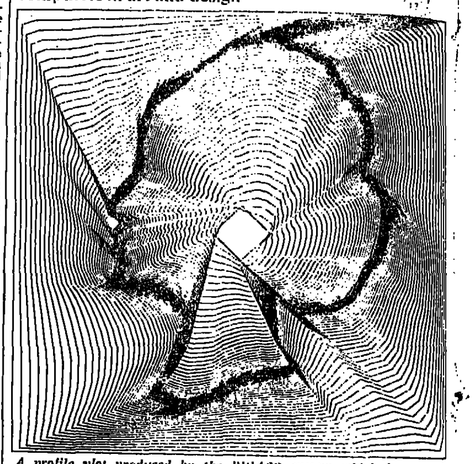
We hope that any new examination in the design area will be flexible enough to accommodate any new specialist themes that may emerge, particularly environmental and architectural design. The new Schools Council project "Art and the urban environment", which is closely related to Pimlico's Front Door work, should be asked to advise on possibilities of this kind.

Our report is being prepared in three parts. Part one is the official submission to the Department of Education and Science. Parts two and three will be generally available and will be the ones of principal interest to teachers. They are likely to be available early in the autumn term. Their publication will be followed by a series of regional conferences where we shall be able to give the latest news of their reception and plan whatever action may then be necessary.

Teachers who wish to keep in touch with developments connected with the RCA report should write to: Research Unit for Design Education, Royal College of Art, Kensington Gore, London, SW7 2EU.

FROM PROFILE PLOTS TO GREEN MUSIC

Patrick Purcell on some current directions of computers in art and design



A profile plot produced by the PICASO system which has a specially developed graphics language to facilitate designer/computer communication.

In the art and design world, the terms "computer art" and "computer aided design" have had an uncertain provenance. Recently an exhibition on computers in art and design at Brunel University prompted a reappraisal of the role of computation in art making and not least in its implication for art and design education.

Several factors combine to suggest this fresh look at the subject. The work revealed at the Brunel exhibition covered textiles, architecture, graphic design and animation, and showed that the variety of applications continues to grow. Several art centres, such as the Royal College of Art and the Slade, now have powerful computer graphics facilities for research and postgraduate training.

Ever since computer scientists hooked up drafting machines and displays to computers in the mid-sixties, computer graphics has been a subject of keen interest to a staunch band of pioneers. They used the technology mainly for picture processing or image transformation, exploiting the drafting and numerical transformation capabilities of the computer to generate both figurative and abstract graphics.

This is fine for the computer enthusiast but for the average graphic designer simply wishing to use computer graphics as a normal professional technique there is still the major issue of communication with the machine, known in the jargon as the "man/machine interface" problem. He can specify his requirements to the programmer but that raises the analogy of the sculptor having to specify the angle and pressure of every chisel blow to a lay collaborator.

One project attempting to resolve this was shown at Brunel, the PICASO (sic) system by John Vince. Its essence is a graphics language specially developed to provide an easier mode of communication with the computer graphics system.

One of the anomalies of computer development has been that, while computer systems have grown more powerful and sophisticated, the naturalness and effectiveness of their communication with users has been abysmal. Several research groups are looking at this problem. For example, George Coulouris at Queen Mary College is working on a conversational reactive computer.

Closer to the subject of our review, Nicholas Negroponte of the Architecture Machine Group at MIT is building the Ideographic System. Negroponte's aim is a computer that can progressively get to know best how the architect or designer using it, a graphics system that would interpret the graphic intentions of the designer as well as recognising drafting quirks and keyboard mannerisms. A graphics system that could recognize left-handedness would be a good start.

Computer art always implies a conjunction of art and science, or at least art and technology, and an artist who takes his position in the complementary relationship of art with science is John Lifton whose "Green Music" exhibition was shown at the Whitechapel Gallery last year. His intention of developing an art form based on the dynamics of complex systemic processes is illustrated in the "Green Music" installation, which monitors the small electrical currents produced by plants and in particular records the changing pattern of electrochemical signals generated by the plants in response to changes in their immediate environment such as temperature change or air movement.

This monitoring operation goes beyond the normal perceivable changes in plant behaviour due to the cycles or vagaries of nature. Monitoring is done by electrodes inserted in the plants. From the electrical signals, rhythmic and tonal analogies are electronically generated under the control of the plants. In effect what is produced is an analogy in sound of the plant's sense of its world.

At the same time, Lifton is conducting a design research programme at the Royal College of Art which is investigating the patterns of associated reasoning during the early stages of design. An important part of this programme is the development of a computer modelling system which is conceived on the principle of a shared design concept between the man and the machine.

Another major protagonist of art work as process is the artist Harold Cohen who left Britain seven years ago to work in California and who became involved with computers there. The central theme of Cohen's research is clarification of the decision making process inherent in image making. Cohen brings the computer into the art gallery so that the machine makes the drawing for the operator in the context of the exhibition.

What distinguishes Cohen's work from the picture processing school is the element of feedback, in that the computer making the drawing is engaged on an extensive series of micro-steps at each of which it examines the current state of the drawing and chooses from its options what to do next. The computer is not just controlling the pen, but inventing a series of unpredictable drawing actions.

Central to the methodology is the concept of drawing protocols which constitute sets of explicit abilities which may be exercised when the machine is engaged in distributing spaces, making clsures, or other aspects of image building. The element of continuous feedback from the state of the drawing task to the decision making programme parallels at least in a primitive fashion some aspects of the human perceptual process.

What are the implications of these various but related strands of activity in computer art and computer aided design? It certainly appears that the state of the art has moved on from the computer as a "super hack" draughtsman largely brought into the design when all the major design decisions have been taken.

Two major directions can be identified, one to make computers more accessible to the community of artists and designers, represented by the work of Coulouris, Vince and Negroponte. (When we shall eventually engage with such congenial automata accommodating idiosyncrasy on the level of human discourse is a matter of further consideration.)

The second strand of development that can be identified is represented by the work of Cohen and Lifton, of major significance in that it implies the refocusing of aesthetic awareness on the processes of art and design—on transformations of energy and information, rather than the detritus of the resultant objets d'art. It is not entirely fortuitous that the heart of the computer system is called the central processor.

Recognition of computer art still remains a matter for individual judgment. The burden of this brief statement is to describe some current developments in the subjects, and to appraise the various ways in which research is helping to articulate the processes of design and of the graphic arts and indirectly to contribute to (and draw from) a varied spectrum of related topics in artificial intelligence, cognitive psychology and computer graphics.

Once, computers were thought to be too expensive for artists to play with. With the falling costs of equipment, artists are now acquiring their own. Both Cohen and Lifton have their computers in the gallery as an integral part of their shows, sturdy mini-computers without need of environmental cossetting. Lifton builds his micro-processors from mail order kits.

In summing up the various trends in computer art developments, there does seem to be a consensus among most workers in the field that the power of the technology should be brought to the widest possible community of artists and designers. As the state of the art moves on from the notion of the computer as a drudge or censor, how can we describe the future role of man and machine? Of the terms currently being coined, the "computer as toy" has the most appeal with its connotations of play, spontaneous interaction, skill acquisition, and exploration.

Perhaps the era of the playful automata will not have really arrived until the school leavers referred to in Ken Baynes's paper combine their new design awareness with computer education to get the most out of the future "surrogate" artists, architects and designers of the eighties.

VOCATIONAL COURSES IN DESIGN

A. J. Marshall on the need for a national qualification and standard

Since the National Diploma in Design (NDD) was replaced by the degree equivalent Diploma in Art and Design (which has subsequently been redesignated to a BA degree), vocational design courses in this country have lacked a national validation structure. This has resulted in a bewildering variety of courses, of varying length, leading to college diplomas, regional awards and professional qualifications.

This means it is impossible to compare the knowledge and ability of students coming from different colleges. Their qualifications and courses are different, and their knowledge and ability are, in consequence, difficult to compare and assess. The need for a national qualification and standard is becoming increasingly obvious to employers, college staff and students. This does not mean there is no place for experimentation and local initiative, but these should be added to a national minimum standard, once the required levels of craftsmanship and professionalism have been secured.

There is also the criticism of many prospective employers that too many college leavers are ill equipped with the technical and professional knowledge necessary for success in professional life. This, of course, is a criticism not of the students but of their courses. Few colleges provide the type of student sought by employers.

The way to correct this is for practising members of the various design disciplines to help devise courses. A minimum requirement for courses leading to national validation should also be established against which courses and students would be examined. There have been many such proposals recently, and we have seen one report after another issued by committees set up by the DES, professional societies, teachers' organizations and other interested parties.

It is, therefore, with trepidation that I offer yet another scheme, or rather a development on the latest official report which would combine a national structure with professional involvement, and correct the present lack of professionalism and technical competence.

The Gann report issued in 1974, made some major recommendations which could provide a viable course structure. The report was quite long, but its major proposals were as follows:

- The Education Secretary should set up a separate national body for vocational courses in art and design.
- This should be autonomous and have a title fully reflecting this status.
- Its functions should resemble those of Technician Education Council and Business Education Council.
- The membership should reflect the interests of education, industry and relevant professional bodies, and also allow regional involvement.
- Reciprocal participation should be sought between TEC and BEC and the new body.
- There should be consultation with TEC and BEC to find a way to bring the new organization into a formal relationship with the TEC and BEC.

Although this proposed national body would determine the detailed specification of vocational courses, Gann also made some recommendations. The most relevant would be a two-tier structure, which recognizes two outlets into employment, one at 18 plus, the other at 20 plus. In most cases, these two courses will coexist in the same college. The junior course will prepare students for employment requiring design knowledge and ability and the senior course will lead to professional recognition.

The Gann report has, with certain reservations, been widely accepted within the design profession. If implemented, it would tidy up the confused vocational sector of design education and provide a national qualification. There have, of course, been different reactions to the report, or rather, the events which followed publication.

The design profession seems alarmed at the prospect of design education coming under the Technician Education Council, who have made a bid to take over design education, whereas Gann and the profession seek an independent body.

The second reaction relates to the delay in government action. The committee took only 18 months to collect, investigate and report. In the light of this and the urgency of the situation, it is surely reasonable for the DES to make their views known within a year, but we still await their comments. The TEC have already established a committee on visual and graphic communication.

In the absence of a national exam, in the past decade the Society of Industrial Artists and Designers direct admission scheme has become the main validating body for vocational courses. From a small involvement in 1964, they now assess more than 1,000 students each year in four main classifications—graphics, fashion/textiles, interiors and product. From their involvement, the SIAD realized that their views coincided with those of other professional design societies. They convened a meeting of representatives from 25 other societies, which discussed the current scene and commented on the general standard and structure of design education. The meeting decided to send a joint letter to the Education Secretary regarding the concern felt about the delay in commenting on the Gann report and stating their alarm at the prospect of design education being controlled by the TEC.

This brief outline merely reports the fact. However, in an attempt to break the deadlock caused by the DES's refusal to comment, and to satisfy the need for a national scheme which will have the support of the profession and overcome the weaknesses of course content outlined earlier, I offer the following suggestions.

The first requirement is to end the association between art and design. For many people they are synonymous, but to those who earn their living as designers they have only incidental similarities. Art and design have been seen "officially" as the same thing for too long, whereas they are no more alike than are veterinary surgeons and doctors. Hence the training, course structure, exams and employment must be seen to be different.

I wish to see the establishment of a Design Education Council and, in the words of Gann, seek a membership of this council which "reflects the interests of education, industry and relevant professional bodies". The DEC should be made up of representatives from industry (CBI and TUC), education (secondary as well as further), and contain a representative from an organization having an interest in design from the consumers interest. This main council should be served by committees, each covering a particular area of design and responsible for the syllabuses for the courses proposed by Gann. They would also be responsible for setting the exams/assessments and validating courses.

These committees should consist of members from appropriate professional bodies. For example, in technical communication design the committee would contain three representatives from the Institute of Technical and Scientific Communicators and the Association of Illustrators, and a representative from associated disciplines such as the Institute of Printing and others. The graphic design committee would contain three members each from the Society of Typographic Designers and the Society of Industrial Artists and Designers, and one from the Institute of Incorporated Photographers and other related professional interests.

In this way the examining and validating body would consist of specialist committees representing professions most concerned with design disciplines and associated professions.

Within these broad divisions subsections could be set up so that someone studying graphic design could select an option, such as book design or packaging. Exams should be in three parts: an assessment of work during the course; an assessment of projects and a written paper on technical, economic and professional aspects of the specialist subject.

Such a structure would be in the interests of the professions, colleges and, most essential, the students. It would provide a national exam established by the profession and ensure that the qualifying students are equipped for professional life. A prerequisite is, of course, for the DES to declare themselves over Gann. Two years is overlong to be reading a report, particularly when there is need for action.

DESIGN AND TECHNOLOGY

A new series, prepared by members of the Design and Technology department at Goldsmiths' College, University of London. The authors provide a course of study in Design and Technology relevant to the three basic materials of wood, metal and plastics. Craft technique is closely linked with the principles of design. The specific characteristics of each material are isolated in order to illustrate the versatility of the material, and to emphasize the connections between its working properties and design considerations.

The series caters for the last three years of secondary education and in particular for the new G.C.E. O-level examination in Design and Technology. In addition it will be useful for Mode 1 C.S.E. courses and will form the basis of an effective Mode 3 syllabus.

A VARIETY OF POTS

Anna Jackson on the BBC 1 television series

Ever since Bernard Leach came back from studying pottery in Japan in 1920 and started his own pottery in St Ives, there has been a revival of interest in this craft throughout the country. The result has been many outstanding potters, a great variety of talent and much activity among amateurs and in schools.

It is with the amateur in mind that BBC Further Education have prepared a series of 25-minute programmes on "The Craft of the Potter". The aim is to show the beginner not only how to make a pot, but how to make a better pot. The programmes take the viewer from an explanation of clay, its properties and preparation, through all the processes of forming pots by hand, throwing on the wheel, to decorating, glazing and firing. The final programme looks at finished pots.

There is no substitute for practical work with clay, and the value of practice is emphasized, but the series is intended to complement this work in ways often not possible in books or evening classes.

The presenter, Michael Casson, is a noted potter with a wide experience of teaching all age groups. He is also a founder member of the Craftsmen Potters Association and co-founder of the Harrow Studio Pottery Course. He demonstrates basic techniques—the wedging and kneading of clay; the way to throw the two fundamental shapes on the wheel, bowl-shape and the cylinder-shape; the use of slip in decoration; and he provides the thread of basic information throughout the series.

The viewer also has a chance to see some notable potters at work. In each programme Mr Casson introduces at least one other potter, who gives more information about the process shown.

Mary Rogers in her workshop in Loughborough shows how she shapes pots by hand, pinching, coiling and slabbing, and discusses the sources of her inspiration in nature forms. Michael Casson is joined in his workshop by David Leach (for many years the right-hand man of his father, Bernard Leach) who is known for his delicate, thrown porcelain cups and teapots. Leach throws porcelain on a kick-wheel, Casson throws stoneware on a power-wheel, and with close-up and juxtaposition the camera can bring out much information about each process.

In programme three visits Casson the Aldermaston Pottery where Alan Caiger-Smith, known for his fine, delicately painted pottery, demonstrates his technique of painting on unfired pots, on a powdery glaze surface and using wax-resist. He shows how each brush has a different language, which can be found with practice. Silcon Nisbet joins Casson to demonstrate other ways of decorating a pot, incising and inlay.

And so in these programmes there is also the broad appeal of watching a craftsman at work in a workshop. In programme four the location is Harrow College with its kilns of all kinds, shapes and sizes. Many visitors find an excitement in the transformation of clay into pottery in the kiln. Walter Keeler explains this process and he and Casson pack and fire a number of different kilns.

Lyanne Reeve, a potter who has recently been researching glazes at the Royal College of Art, unravels the mysteries of glaze. She gives examples of experiments and their results, starting with a basic analysis of what glaze is and how it works, and then using common metal oxides, such as iron, copper and cobalt.

Many amateur potters do not have the chance to look at a large variety of good professional pottery. The series supplements this deficiency by showing examples of finished work by well-known potters to illustrate techniques and processes. The final programme from the British Crafts Centre widens the scope further in a discussion, chaired by Michael Casson.

In each programme Casson shows pottery from the past to illustrate the techniques of the present—Sung tea-bowls from China, decorated Persian bottles, thrown pots from ancient Greece, had-built forms from the Nazca civilization of pre-Columbian South America, loaned by the Victoria and Albert Museum and Horniman Museum at Forest Hill, South London.

At the moment the programmes are being transmitted on Monday evenings at 7.05 pm on BBC 2, but they will be repeated on Tuesday evenings on BBC 1 at about 11 pm from May 18.

An exhibition linked to the series is running at the British Crafts Centre, Earlham Street, London, until May 14. An information pamphlet giving technical details from the series, has been prepared jointly by the BBC and the Crafts Advisory Committee. It is available by sending a very large stamped addressed envelope to: The Craft of the Potter, BBC Television, London W12 8QT.

LONDON, E.C.2
CENTRAL FOUNDATION BOYS' GRAMMAR SCHOOL
Cowper Street, London EC2A 4AP (Near Old Street Station)
Required to commence in September in this three-form entry Voluntary Aided Boys' Grammar School, a GRADUATE TEACHER of ENGLISH.
The major commitment will be to the teaching of English but the successful applicant will be required to undertake a certain amount of teaching in a second subject. There are many possibilities and candidates are asked to state in their letters of application what subsidiary subject they could offer, and to what level. Alternatively, for an outstanding applicant not able to offer a subsidiary subject, a part-time appointment, probably of four days a week, might be arranged.
Under the plans for the re-organisation of the School, the first-year intake in September, 1977, will consist of boys of the full range of ability and the person now to be appointed will therefore participate in the planning of the English work to be undertaken from September, 1977, onwards.
Applications, by letter only, should be addressed to the Headmaster at the School, and should include full details of qualifications and experience if any. The names and addresses of two referees should be given.

LONDON, E.C.4.
CENTRAL FOUNDATION BOYS' GRAMMAR SCHOOL
Cowper Street
London EC2A 4AP
(Near Old Street Station)

Required to commence in September in this three-form-entry Voluntary Aided Boys' Grammar School, a GRADUATE TEACHER of FRENCH.

The major commitment will be to the teaching of French but the successful applicant will be required to undertake a certain amount of teaching in a second subject. There are many possibilities and candidates are asked to state in their letters of application what subsidiary subject they could offer, and to what level. Alternatively, for an outstanding applicant not able to offer a subsidiary subject, a part-time appointment, probably of four days a week, might be arranged.

Under the plans for the reorganization of the school, the first year intake in September 1977 will consist of boys of the full range of ability and the person now to be appointed will therefore participate in the planning of the French work to be undertaken from September 1977 onwards.

Applications, by letter only, should be addressed to the Headmaster at the School, and should include full details of qualifications and experience if any. The names and addresses of two referees should be given.

Balding & Mansell Limited (of Wisbech) require an

Educationalist for development of Learning Materials

The Company:
Balding & Mansell is an expanding progressive, high quality printing company serving the U.K., Europe and America.

The Job:
Learning Development Aids (LDA) is the Educational Division of Balding & Mansell Limited and publishes materials specially developed for children with learning difficulties. It is primarily concerned with the development of pre-language, language, auditory and reading skills and is continually extending its range. This now demands an additional person to work for the Manager of LDA, as a member of a small team engaged in developing and marketing new products.

The Person:
The person should be open-minded, innovative and keen to be involved in the problems of child development in general and learning problems in particular. The age range will probably be between 23 and 30 years. The ability to get on with people and communicate well is essential.

The Conditions:
Four weeks holiday, excellent pension scheme and pleasant working environment. Salary will be negotiable relative to experience. Ample training will be given.

Applications, accompanied by a full curriculum vitae, should be sent to:

The Director, Plant & Personnel
Balding & Mansell Limited
Park Works
Wisbech
Cambs. PE13 2AX.

IF YOU CAN TEACH, YOU CAN SELL.

We're looking for new people to work as sales support staff in the West Country (particularly in the Bristol area) and West Midlands.

You will be primarily concerned with customer training and education in the use of our complex business equipment – particularly duplicators and copiers. This not only covers operator training but also training in applications of the equipment to business systems problems.

This could well be an ideal appointment for someone with a background in the educational field who is looking for an opportunity to move into, or perhaps return to, commerce. Career opportunities in sales or marketing are both real and varied.

Salary is around £3,700. You have the use of a car, 4 weeks' holiday (increasing to 5), and first rate pension and insurance provisions.

If you think this might be the job for you, write and tell us why.

Ed Millie, Area Personnel Manager,
Rank Xerox (UK) Ltd,
Herford House, 36 Herford St, Coventry CV1 1LD.

BIRMINGHAM

Theatre

Laughter conquers all

Heather Neill on Gorky and Shakespeare

"In my opinion you do not use sufficient restraint. You are like a spectator in the theatre who expresses his rapture so unreservedly that he prevents both himself and others from listening." So wrote Chekhov to Gorky in 1898. He had not, apparently, learnt his master's lesson by 1913 when he wrote The Zykovs while in exile on Capri for his part in the disturbances of 1905. The play, now staged by the RSC at the Aldwych, sputters along more or less acceptably to begin with, like a mildly defective catherine wheel: people come and go somewhat arbitrarily, but the initial characterization leads one to hope for interesting developments. Then, half way through, it has begun to gather manic speed, until it finally leaves its moorings altogether, quite out of control.

We begin with a stock situation: an old man (Paul Rogers) marries a pretty, inexperienced girl (Mia Farrow), having snatched her from under his son's nose, and pays for his mistake in disappointment and jealousy. He abandons his business to his capable sister and threatens to kill himself. But Gorky has not made up his mind which is the central character, brother or sister, and the result is a lack of coherence, baros started and forgotten and, finally, melodrama bordering on farce. Incident piles on incident: Sofia, the sister, sends a fraudulent business partner packing; a trusty servant announces his departure; Pavla, the bride, denies loving her husband who immediately discovers a revolver (previously unmentioned) and points it at himself; he apparently has a heart attack but recovers on hearing a shot as his son, in turn, attempts suicide. Eventually, father and son embrace in a passionate reunion and Pavla is turned out with her mother.

The character with most potential is Sofia, the sensuous, practical woman who berates her would-be lover, the forest warden, for his growing cynicism. She is beautifully played by Sheila Allen, who all but succeeds in rising above the chaos of the last act. The forest warden's cry that "Nobody needs a revolution any more" is a reflection of the frustration felt in 1913 by Gorky and his contemporaries. But this is not a political play like Enemies, for instance. There is an attempt, instead, to explore human relationships: the doll-like Pavla babbles about wanting everyone to be good to each other while, partly by accident, partly in malice, causing destruction on all sides, but few of the sufferers achieve more than occasional flashes of life. This is the fourth of Gorky's plays to be staged by the RSC at the Aldwych since 1971. As before, the translators are Jeremy Brooks and Kitty Hunter-Blair, and David Jones directs.

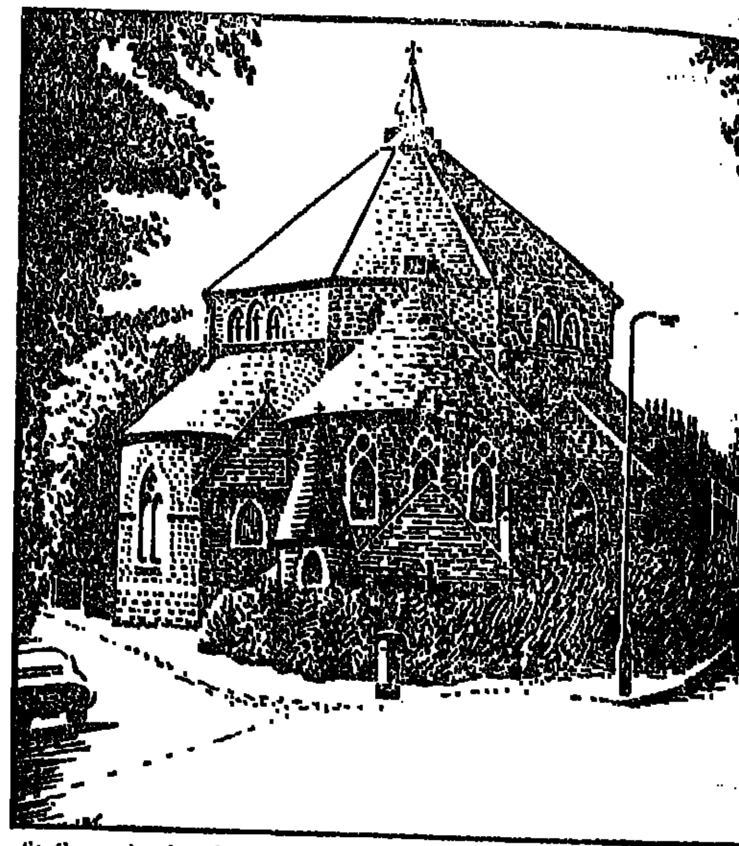
Many happy coincidences attend the opening of the St George's Theatre, Tufnell Park. The building, a converted church, happens to match almost exactly, in shape and dimensions, the Elizabethan Globe Theatre. Its Gothic arches, says the set designer, C. Walter Hodges, recall those of the Shakespearian Blackfriars Theatre, and, after many years of planning, the first production takes the stage 400 years after the setting up of the first London playhouse, the Theatre, in Shoreditch, not so very far away.

The permanent, though flexible, set with its typical Elizabethan balcony and tiring house, and the thrust stage with audience on three sides provide a convincing reproduction of a Renaissance playhouse. The effect is certainly very pleasing in Twelfth Night, directed by Frank Hauser.

George Murcell, artistic director of Shakespeare at St. George's, sets out the aims of the company in a programme note. Shakespeare's characters, he argues, are "bounded by certain attitudes and beliefs relative to his time and not by modern political, ethical and psychological factors". The intention, then, is to present the text as nearly as possible as it might have been seen in Shakespeare's day.

In some respects this certainly works well in the cast of Twelfth Night: the jokes come to life marvellously and the plot speeds along, full of colour and joie de vivre, the excellent period music (played by Musica Antiqua, of London) being an integral part of the whole. Elvi Hale's Maria sparkles in this setting and Lynn Farleigh is a courageous Viola. But the director describes the ending of the play as the victory of fun over melancholia. In fact, there is never a battle: Malvolio (Eric Porter) is simply a figure of fun, allowed little in the way of dignity or respect from the first; as played by Sarah Badel, Olivia's sadness is pure affectation—she girlishly jumps at the chance of sport; the Clown is merely looking for lucrative freelance employment at Orsino's house and is willing to sing a sad song if that will please, though he is not especially melancholy himself. The result is that one leaves the theatre happy but a little unsatisfied.

The next production is to be Romeo and Juliet but the company plan to stage the whole Shakespeare canon during the next seven years.



St George's church, Tufnell Park. This drawing by Betty Tadman, first appeared in the "TES" on June 14, 1968 alongside an article by Michael Church describing George Murcell's plans for the building.

Television

Fifty years on

David Blewitt

The General Strike
Every evening on ITV after the News at Ten.

May 3 1926 probably means nothing to postwar generations except, perhaps, to those who have survived the deserts of A level history teaching. They might recall the year as that of the General Strike. Yorkshire Television, which has recently chalked up some notable successes, now marks the 50th anniversary of the Strike with a 10 day marathon, General Strike Report, that is wholly original and of exceptional interest to schools.

The Strike lasted nine days. The Samuel Commission on the mines declared, in March 1926, that pay cuts were inevitable but offered no reduction in working hours. However, reorganization was recommended. The rejection of these findings by both miners and employers released a build-up of tension since the turn of the century over working conditions and wages that paralysed the nation from Tuesday May 4 to Wednesday May 12 1926, when the Strike was called off, unconditionally, by the TUC General Council. The miners battled on alone until November, but the greatest ever effort by organized labour to better working conditions collapsed with mystifying suddenness, having achieved nothing. It was the postwar Labour government that put it together again.

YTV's General Strike Report helps to clarify these mysteries with economy and a fitting panache. They have harnessed the considerable techniques of modern television presentation to compile a "day by day report on the nine days of the General Strike as it happened". Fifteen minute "bulletin reports" follow immediately after News at Ten or the main news slot at the weekend. Date and day of the week correspond exactly to those of 1926. Michael Deakin, executive producer, explains: "The actual speed with which events unrolled is the essence of the drama of the Strike, when such factors as loss of nerve played a major role". Moreover, wide regional coverage of events has made for an overview that was not then possible; the viewer enjoys an enviable omniscience. Robert Kee's concerned but objective presentation of the facts enhances credibility. The result is not strictly documentary but neither is it mere reconstruction. Viewers experience the actuality of events untainted by hindsight so that their response to issues is immediate yet subjective in the best sense.

At a time when so-called progressive education is under fire, teachers committed to it should welcome General Strike Report as a godsend. Here are reports whose imagination and flair reanimate history and remind children that they are part of it, not just bored dummies to be forced-fed adult myths. Even those with only a minimal concern for the shaping of their times should make it their business to watch. Today marks only the fourth day of the strike.

Documentary schizophrenia

The legacy of John Grierson, the man who is credited with the invention of the British documentary, has been schizophrenic; one offshoot is the drama documentary, in which authentic background and events are used as a framework for something which is essentially fiction, such as Ken Loach's Days of Hope and Jack Gold's The Naked Civil Servant. The other, is not (as might be expected) television reportage, but the sponsored documentary where the paternalistic commentator still addresses and browbeats his audience.

These thoughts were prompted by an evening at the national film theatre viewing the entries for this year's Grierson award—a bronze head of the good doctor looking dyspeptic, as well he might, considering the state of British film-making.

Apart from lamenting the general decline of this activity—one can scarcely call television spin-offs and skin-flicks an industry—John Chittock, president of the British Federation of Film Societies who presented the award, spoke with enthusiasm about the evening's offerings. They had, he said, been entered by invitation, a process he implied was exhaustive. If this were the case, independent film-making is in almost as bad a way as the industry. Two of the films I had seen before—Robin Lehman's See has had a limited release, while War, from the National Film School and shown on BBC's First House last year, was made in 1974.

War, jointly directed by David G. Griffiths and John Sharrard, was well worth the reviewing. Based on a Jack London short story, it is about a confederacy soldier who deserts during the American Civil War (shades of Incident at Owl Creek?). Here the willow-fringed gravel pits of Berkshire do duty for Virginia in a stunningly executed piece which builds up tension almost unbearably until the final irony of the deserter's death at the hands of a sharpshooter he spared. Particularly striking was the stills sequence which opened the film, as husband and wife appear like mute ghostlike wraiths on the monochrome background.

Perhaps the whole idea of watching films for four and a half hours makes for indigestion, but my flagging appetite was whetted by a second camera's-eye view of making Winstanley. It happened here again was a rather lengthy account of the struggles of Andrew Mollo and Kevin Brownlow to make their second feature.

The documentary itself was shot in colour, a disconcerting contrast to the austere black and white of Winstanley itself. The message, however, was plain—meticulous attention to detail, talent and perseverance cannot win against the distribution system, where £10,000 to make a film is simply too cheap. Less than the titles of a James Bond film, said Brownlow with resignation. (In view of such pessimism it is good to know that Winstanley has got a distributor and will open the Other Cinema's new cinema in September.)

BP's Sea Areas Forties had good pictures, but little or no actuality and thus little sense of involvement. The commentator playing God directed our reactions to every frame. Fields became "the green tartan of Scotland's farmland"; waves could not break, they had to "jostle and joust".

A linguistic tic which would have delighted Clive James was the use of the verb "must" to give a sense of urgency to the proceedings—as in "these are the men who must . . ." or simply "they" must. And yet in the welter of linguistic overkill, there was a startling image which described the burying of miles of oil pipeline as an ancient ritual of interring the snake god—it almost worked.

The winner of the award was another propaganda piece, sponsored this time by the Central Office of Information and the Department of the Environment. Drive carefully, darling, directed by John Krish, got over its simple message with neatness and humour.

The former owed something to the sketch from Woody Allen's Everything you wanted to know about sex . . . in which a sexual encounter was coordinated like a moon shot, mission control being the brain. In this version brain, memory and ego sat in the control room and squabbled over what the driver should do.

Araminta Wordsworth

Poetry

Voice, word, image

Barry Fantoni on Christopher Logue

It is a supreme irony that Christopher Logue, in his fortnightly spot for Private Eye, should be confined to the role of "True Stories" editor, while his stablemate, E. J. Thribb, is given full poetical rein.

To compound the irony, Thribb is, on the basis of readership, one of our five most read poets. But whereas Thribb epitomizes everything barren in contemporary poetry, so Logue emerges from the last two decades as a poet with rare riches, and the requisite skill to display them.

At the Open Space Theatre, Tottenham Court Road, Christopher Logue has been giving lunchtime readings—the first time, so the programme notes inform us, that a poet has attempted to sustain a reading of his own works in a London theatre environment.

Before he unobtrusively took his seat behind a simple, cloth-covered table (the only prop), I found myself asking if I were to judge first his performance, or his poems. At 43 Logue looks, sounds, and is every inch a poet. His voice and the images his words evoke are natural partners. In just over 30 minutes he produced a string of unforgettable lines, taking his audience through countless shades of emotion.

His ever-expanding "Headlines" is a collection of some real, some invented headlines. Wonderfully funny, the poem reaches a crescendo of insanity with lines of the "Nudist Welfare Man's Model Wife Fell For Chinese Hypnotist From the Co-Op Bacon Factory" type. "Headlines" end with tragic simplicity: "Last Horse Dies".

On the evidence of this performance, Christopher Logue may not have to ask, as he does in one of his more recent poems, "Who will look after my verses when I am gone?" There will be a queue for the privilege.

TV

Comprehensive schedule

is term nine courses start on dio and television which should of interest to teachers of foreign nguages. There is a comprehene schedule with new series, new ogrammes within familiar series, d several repeats.

On schools television there are ree possibilities all broadly for e 11 to 14 age range. Quatre oins de la France (Mondays 11.00, peated on Wednesdays at 10.00, BC) is a group of four films reited from various other programmes, such as Merry-Go-Round nd The French Way, with a dubbed rench commentary. The result is look at aspects of rural life as een by a number of different rench people.

On previous showings these programmes have been well received nd they cover a lot of ground in visually appealing way. The acher's notes can also be ordered n multiple copies for use with pupils since they contain the whole ext of the programmes.

Corners of France (Wednesdays 11.40, repeated the following week on Friday 9.38, BBC) is an ingenious re-adaptation of the French version, this time with an English commentary. It is the first example of an interesting new policy which will be continued with next year's German series, where the same films are shown with different soundtracks.

This series can be used either for linguistic purposes in close conjunction with Quatre Coins, or by itself for work in geography and European studies.

ITV's eight programme series Le Nouvel Arrivé is given its second showing on Mondays 9.50, Tuesdays 11.39, and Thursdays 11.30. It follows a young English boy through some experiences during his visit to France. Taken by themselves the programmes catch the flavour of contemporary France but for detailed linguistic work the films should be used with the work pack published by Mary Glasgow Ltd. This offers a flexible choice between filmstrips, pupil's workbooks, sound tape and 16mm films.

On schools radio three language series are being broadcast. Nous Y Sommes! (Wednesdays 10.45) is designed for younger pupils at post beginners level. Simple French structures are presented to supplement classwork by means of short dramatized programmes, with titles such as "Pas de Chance en Avignon" or "Un bouledogue bien français".

France (Mondays 10.45) is in English but covers a broad spectrum of life to inform older secondary pupils who may not be studying French. Particularly recommended is the last programme this term which is a radiovision exploration of the Touraine. Russian teachers have a repeat of the Privyet series (Thursdays 10.45 which uses dramatizations to emphasize aspects of Russian life and language.

The only material on radio or television for German classes is in the Euromagazine series, produced primarily for FE students, but of possible use with good sixth form pupils (Wednesdays 19.00 Radio 3, Sundays 15.00 VHF 4). The first five programmes are in French and the second six in German.

The main function of Euromagazine is to provide topical information and reflections. It uses interviews with well-known personalities and documentary investigation. However, details of the content of these programmes are not available much in advance, the only source being the small print in the Radio Times.

A final series which should be of interest is a repeat of the Teaching Languages programmes first broadcast around Christmas (Wednesday, 19.00 Radio 3 from 26 May). These are meant for teachers and provide a forum for presenting up-to-date information and exchanging opinions on topics such as how to make the most of a language laboratory, how to organize resources, when to teach grammar, how to exploit radio and television broadcasts and what to do with your French assistant. The BBC is publishing a book to supplement the series.

Urban survival

Tonight's Playhouse (BBC 2, 10.10 pm) Play Things is about the sole remaining playleader on a much-vandalized London adventure playground, and his survival amid an underworld of violence and petty (and not so petty) crime.

The play maintains this series' consistently high standard and redeems the expectations of Stephen Frears as director. Filmed on location in Notting Hill with local children (and members of the Anna Scher Children's Theatre) and written by Peter Prince, a former playleader, the story is no documentary. A plausible fantasy of a plot is successfully planted in a convincingly seedy milieu.

Jonathan Pryce's central outstandingly intense performance conveys the character's sheer terror of intimidation and his bleak, stolid passivity, deserted by his wife and colleagues, drifting from a rejected career in architecture, searching for what he "really" wants to do, convinced only that this is still not it.

Effectively bribed to remain by Tenby from the council's recreation department (virtually the only visible representative of outside order), he in turn buys protection from the rival gangs of black and white youths, juvenile league parallels of the adult villians that balance local power. Through fear, indifferences and expediency—he increasingly acquiesces in the contagious corruption of gang diplomacy.

Though sometimes terrifying, Play-Things is often very funny, particularly in its portrayal of the Teddy Boys, aging hangovers from an earlier youth culture, with their clothes and hairstyles, annual pilgrimages to Eddie Cochrane's grave and their jealously-preserved local "caff".

One of the title's implications could be that nothing matters in this particular world: social and moral values are play things too. Beyond the crudest sense of self-preservation, the playleader—and his distant employers—seem to care little. "It's only rock and roll" may commonly express this. Ironically it is these Teds alone, who have some faith (however ridiculous), as one of them, Straker, indicates. When the playleader, trying to win his confidence, claims to have liked the music, Straker pertinently replies: "Ah, but would you die for it?"

It is altogether appropriate that we should see so little of the children for whom the playground is supposedly intended. They are foremost among the interests neither of the council recreation man, concerned only with a semblance to reassure his superiors, nor of the playleader, convinced he cannot get on with them.

However, one little girl dogs him persistently, sceptical that he is really married (and eventually proven nearer the truth than she knows). The final image freezes her questioning face, looking after his departing figure. This neatly symbolizes our own moral doubts, for this compelling thriller—lurid though it may be in the ultimate accumulation of details—raises more insistent, in inchoate questions about its urban jungle setting than many a social documentary.

Objectivity and concern

Colin Mares

The Native Americans (10 programmes, BBC 1, Sundays, 11.15 pm (approx.), April 11 to June 13) is concerned with the history, culture, way of life and present political standing of the twenty or so major tribes of American Indians, America's oldest inhabitants. Each programme deals with different tribes living in various parts of America and Canada and includes film shot on 17 locations, commentary, historical material and the views of tribal chiefs, officials and other Indians.

The first three programmes have built up a picture of a dignified people suppressed, deprived and shabbily treated by successive administrations; victims of greed, broken promises and disastrous and half-hearted policies. Subject matter such as this is the stuff of passionate feeling and yet the initiative and enterprise of the producer, Brenda Horsfield, do not consistently get their full reward in the final presentations.

The commentary contains much interesting material but its impact is too often dulled by the unexpressive way in which it is read. The testimony of the Indians themselves is perhaps too staged and restricted, the comments too cagey to arouse any lasting concern about the points at issue.

Some of the film is unique—covering the spectacular riding of the Indian cowboys at the Blackfeet Rodeo, alligator wrestling in inaccessible Seminole villages, the dramatic night dances of the Oklahoma tribes as well as mundane but, nevertheless, absorbing glimpses of life on the reservations.

Other less interesting sequences are too reminiscent of the placidity of popular travelogues although the inclusion of well selected historical material gives each programme an acceptable balance.

There is much to commend in the series particularly if one bears in mind that the experts gloomily predicted that it could not be made. But more emotional involvement must be engendered if any serious impact is to be made on generations of palefaces brought up on the celluloid myths of cowboys and Indians. It is a mistaken belief that educational material must somehow be watered down to retain its integrity and objectiveness.

The series is to be repeated on Sundays at 1.25 pm from June 20 to September 5.

Rates of change

Plant-Animal Communities
Ecological Succession
Colour, running time 13½ minutes, issued in 1968.
Plankton To Fish: A Food Cycle
Colour, running time 10½ minutes, year of issue 1974.
Distributed by Gateway Educational Media, St Lawrence House, 29-31 Bond Street, Bristol BS1 2HF.

Both films are from the United States. Plant-Animal Communities is concerned with the process of change in eco-systems. It makes the point that areas of an apparently permanent nature may be changing, although the process can take hundreds or even thousands of years to make its effects obvious.

One such chain of events is illustrated, starting a process of ecological succession from the bare rock. Lichens are seen as the first colonisers, starting to break down the surface of the rocks. As a result, mosses find conditions favourable for growth. These in turn change the environment so that larger plants can flourish. The changes in animal population that follow vegetation changes are also shown.

Burrowing insects attract insect eating animals, then the developing habitat provides suitable conditions for larger animals. The film shows the development to a climax community. It carefully makes the point that the nature of such a community depends on various environmental factors such as rainfall.

An aquatic succession is also illustrated, starting from a pool and eventually reaching a stable terrestrial community which might be a grassland or a forest. Finally, the effects of man on succession are shown. For example, the construction of a dam drastically changes the course of succession in the area inundated by the water.

The second film shows a simple food chain found in a lake. First, plankton is collected and examined in the laboratory. The film shows the range of organisms found in the catch. A water flea is dissected and the gut contents examined to find the presence of algae.

Fish are shown feeding on water fleas and their gut contents again confirm the nature of their food, so the simple food chain—algae—water flea—fish is established. The cycle is completed as nutrients from the fish promote the growth of algae.

Using a series of aquarium tanks, the film demonstrates the effect of changing the balance on this cycle. Extra fish in one tank results in a shortage of food, and the fish are shown to be much thinner than those in the control tank. Removal of the fish from a tank results in a population explosion of the water fleas, but this is followed by exhaustion of their food supply and death of the water fleas.

Those two films illustrate two important aspects of ecology and can both be related to first-hand observations. The second film is particularly attractive in this respect, as it indicates ways in which the food relationships in a community can be studied by simple observations and investigation.

Book programme

Next Tuesday's Book Programme (BBC 2, 7.45 pm) on children's books, could hardly repeat the controversial impact of the programme's recent interview with Solzhenitsyn. But children's books can, nevertheless, generate passionate ideological controversy, now that radical campaigners on both sides of the Atlantic—prominently here the Children's Rights Workshop—are spreading a new consciousness of alleged racism and sexism in children's books.

The Book Programme will be tackling just one of those issues, sexism, now particularly topical following suggestions that books perpetuating conventional sexual roles may actually contravene the new Sex Discrimination Act. Though campaigners can sometimes seem intolerantly sweeping in compiling a new radical Index Librorum Prohibitorum of condemned books (including many popular classics of the past or present), there is still a strong case to discuss.

Robert Robinson will be talking to guest speakers on both sides of this argument, and introducing extracts from some offending texts, not all such obvious targets as the old Janet and John readers. He will also mention a few books that have passed the new, rigorous tests of child-worthiness.
